

Between Munich and Kiel - explore 2000 miles of Germany

German cities present many faces to the visitors, full of tradition and yet modern. They are pulsating with life and are cosmopolitan meeting places, offering you the treasures of the past and the pleasures of the present.

Sparkling springs everywhere, more than 200 spas. Springs for heart and kidney complaints, for every liver and stomach, for all types of treatment. And if nothing else, you, golf and fresh air will make you feel better still.

Here there's nothing virtuous in staying thirsty. Wine has been grown for nearly 2000 years. Every town has brewed its own beer since the Middle Ages whilst German sparkling wine came in about 1800. You'll never be dry in Germany.

A shopping spree in famous streets. Perhaps in elegant shops that sell fine jewellery, rare antiques and trendy fashions. Or in the little bakery. After all, there are more than 200 kinds of bread in Germany.

Albrecht Dürer was born 600 years ago. He painted in the ancient town of Nürnberg, where his house still stands. You will see many towns in Germany which still look as they did in Dürer's time.

See in 1971 what the rest of the world will discover in 1972-Germany, scene of the Olympic Games. Follow the whole, or part, of the 2000 mile "Olympic Tour" we have designed for you.

You can call on all stretches of the German seas (in Olympic style, too). And the next swimming pool is just around the corner. What if you don't like watersports? Take to the air! Gliders, anyone?

Between Munich and Kiel - explore 2000 miles of Germany.

I am interested in a pre-Olympic visit to Germany. Please send me full information.

Name _____
Address _____
Please write in block letters and do not omit the postal code.
Send coupon to: Deutsche Zentrale für Fremdenverkehr
9 Frankfurt (Main), Goethestrasse 69

The German Tribune

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF THE GERMAN PRESS

C 20725 C

Hamburg, 4 November 1971
10th Year - No. 499 - By air

Political ramifications of Peace Prize deserve consideration

Names in the news change fast and furiously in this day and age and last week's sensation, the awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Willy Brandt, has already faded in newsworthiness in comparison with other, in some cases more controversial topics.

The abundance of views and opinions voiced in the wake of the decision by the five Wise Men in Oslo nonetheless still merit thinking about, particularly as the award ceremony is not to take place for another six weeks.

The Prize awarded to the Chancellor is, to quote one American comment, a factor in world affairs. It is also, one is tempted to add, a factor in home affairs. In varying degrees the award or non-award of the Swedish dynamite manufacturer's prize, intended to be a moral yardstick, has become a political factor over the years. Seldom, however, has it been quite such a political dynamite as on this occasion.

It has always been basically the same problem. Should the Prize be awarded to a man of ideas, an altruist whose work points the world in the direction of lasting peace, or ought it to go to a policy pursued, a policy of which the outcome is as yet uncertain.

None of the many commentaries has disputed for a moment that the man himself is worthy of the award.

One important point is that the award has been made to a German - 27 years after Auschwitz, as many commentators were quick to note.

This year's Nobel Prize, French and other leader writers commented, amounts to absolution or the final act thereof. The heritage of the Third Reich has at long last been consigned to history.

Oddly enough, this kind of comment serves to remind us that the heritage of the past is still a burden this country has to shoulder. The reminder is, perhaps, timely. History can never be consigned completely to oblivion.

A second, major aspect of the Nobel Peace Prize award is the repercussions at home of the praise for Willy Brandt's foreign policy.

"Brandt will not have less difficulty in securing ratification of the treaties with Moscow and Warsaw," a major French newspaper noted in its headline, and there is, of course, a fair amount of truth in this frank comment.

On the day after the news of the award Rainer Barzel, Opposition leader in the Bundestag, delivered a noteworthy speech in which he rejected total confrontation between government and Opposition in favour of objective debate on, specifically, Ostpolitik.

It may, of course, well be that this or a similar move would have been made regardless of the previous day's news. But the Opposition leader was astute enough himself briefly to note a certain connection between the two events in order to

Chancellor Willy Brandt was given a standing ovation in the Bundestag when it was announced that he had been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize and CDU leader, Rainer Barzel, congratulated the Chancellor. (Photo: J.H. Darchinger)

Walter Scheel's whistle-stop tour of West Africa

STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG

The idea of Foreign Minister Walter Scheel embarking on a whistle-stop tour of Africa is a strange one. Five countries in ten days (Nigeria, Congo-Kinshasa, Cameroon, Ivory Coast and Mauritania) is fast work, without a shadow of a doubt.

This is particularly true of these particular countries, since geographical proximity is pretty well all they have in common. They differ considerably in political outlook, history, development and so on. What is more, their climates differ, which does not make the programme any easier.

At the same time it would be wrong to conclude that the whole tour is a waste of time because nothing useful can come of it. It would have done him no harm to take more time but Walter Scheel can claim to have coped with the tour faster than others would have managed.

To begin with, he is conversant with the individual countries and their problems from his years as Minister of Development Aid. He knows his hosts too, many of them personally, and Walter Scheel is the last man one could accuse of finding it hard to make contacts.

What is more, his talks were carefully prepared in advance, by the Foreign Ministers of the countries concerned on the one hand and by Herr Scheel himself in talks with his opposite numbers at the UN General Assembly in New York.

The only accusation that can justifiably be levelled is one that his wife could make. Strenuous tours of this kind cannot do his health any good.

(Stuttgarter Zeitung, 23 October 1971)

Bonn-Paris cooperation vital to Europe

Differences of opinion might otherwise congeal.

It is not only the international monetary crisis that has drawn Bonn and Paris apart; this country's Ostpolitik is also making the French think twice.

On the one hand they are having to come to terms with a new German self-awareness, on the other there are differences of opinion as to the further steps that remain to be taken.

France, having for the last ten years built up its defences behind a US-German protective shield, is bound to feel troops cut in Central Europe to be more problematic than this country does, being in a different political and military position.

The Bonn government repeatedly emphasises that its Ostpolitik can only be based on "remaining embedded in an active Westpolitik."

The meeting between Brandt and Pompidou forms part of this most essential activity.

(Frankfurter Rundschau, 25 October 1971)

IN THIS ISSUE

PEACE PRIZE Page 3
Norwegian parliament honours Chancellor Willy Brandt

PHILICS Page 5
Contented at home but under criticism

EDUCATION Page 9
Ready teachers from America
Down in Hamburg

WORKING CONDITIONS Page 11
Aid professor recommends
Five day instead of 4-day week

SPORT Page 15
The modern athlete trains to be dehumanised super-human

DISCUSSION, a statesman representing a approach to international affairs, at the helm whose decisions, for or for ill, will decide whether there is war or peace?

For year the award committee has for either the one solution or the occasionally indeed awarding the Prize to institutions, much in the
of a charitable body.

This year's award represents a leap right up-to-the-minute world affairs, the response, critical and approving, reflects an assessment of the

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Soviet domestic and foreign policies reviewed

DIE ZEIT

Moscow's current attitude towards the West is characterised not only by diplomatic and propagandist verve but also by a quality that is new. Signing of the Berlin Agreement and concern with troop cuts, a topic that has been studiously avoided for years, bear witness to fresh substance.

Soviet readiness to continue the detente dialogue with Western Europe and the United States irrespective even of President Nixon's declared intention of visiting Peking and Moscow's willingness to acknowledge existing ties and links in the West are indicative of a new realism. The Soviet endeavour to become partners with the West in technology and trade has assumed a fresh sense of urgency.

How credible is this trend towards detente and change in Europe on the Kremlin's part? How highly can it be rated and to what extent can it be considered a long-term policy?

There can be no gainsaying the existence of a worrying uncertainty as to the motives and background of the latest Kremlin policy. To a considerable extent, though, it can be defused and viewed more objectively after close scrutiny and analysis.

An attempt to do just this was made at the recent Bonn conference of the Federal Republic Eastern European Studies Association. Wolfgang Leonhard provided information on Soviet domestic policy and Richard Löwenthal reviewed Soviet foreign policy.

Leonhard retraced the path taken by Moscow since October 1964 and the end of the relaxed and experimental policies pursued by Nikita Khrushchev and leading up to the rigid approach to home affairs and dislike of reform shown by Leonid Brezhnev.

Already in April 1965, a mere six months after the fall of Khrushchev, the moratorium on de-Stalinisation so characteristic of the Brezhnev era was imposed.

In a succession of memoirs written by Second World War generals Stalin's name was again cast in a positive light and emphasis given to his role as a major war leader.

The foundations of the conservative Brezhnev regime were then laid in swift succession. The Soviet military budget was drastically increased and a campaign launched to foster military patriotism.

A watered-down version of economic reform was announced, considerably scaling down original targets. Cultural policies were tightened up and a purge of the agitprop machine conducted.

The mass media were also affected by the purge and writers Yuri Daniel and Andrei Sinyavski arrested, tried and sentenced.

Reversion to a domestic policy line geared primarily to discipline, order, authority and maintenance of power has also influenced ideological trends.

Khrushchev's conciliatory-sounding tenets of the "Party of the entire people" and the "peaceful transition to Socialism" were consigned to oblivion.

In their place Leonid Brezhnev called for unwavering ideological warfare against right-wing opportunists, revisionists, Trotskyites and other deviationists.

Leonhard attributes this ideological clarification, loudly sounded in spring 1968, not only to the Prague experiment with humane and democratic Communist but also, indeed primarily, to the renewed virulence of domestic opposition in the Soviet Union.

In recent years, Wolfgang Leonhard noted, Soviet domestic opposition has changed in character. Under the influence of a general reversion to inflexibility and motivated by disappointed hopes of reform individual acts of protest have given way to a truly collective movement with programmatic ideas.

Soviet underground literature has grown more political. The spark of opposition has extended from youthful extremist splinter groups to liberal groups that under Khrushchev formed part of the Establishment. More and more scientists and technocrats are involved.

The movement has yet to attain any political significance but it nonetheless represents a potential element of uncertainty for a regime accustomed to modes of government increasingly contrasting with the aspirations of Soviet industrial society.

The turn of home affairs in the Soviet Union is termed by Leonhard "limited neo-Stalinism." Optically it differs quite fundamentally from the Stalinism of the feared Soviet past.

Mass terror has been replaced by controlled doses of terror. The ruthless priority given by Stalin to heavy industry has given way to a greater consideration for consumer goods.

Despite an unmistakable increase in his personal power Leonid Brezhnev has yet to emerge as an uncontrollable sole ruler, for that matter. There are, then, limits to the Brezhnev cult.

The crucial characteristic of the Brezhnev regime, condemned as it is to collectivity, would appear to be immobility. There is a lack of punch in the direction of either tough re-Stalinisation or further-reaching reformist de-Stalinisation.

Firmly entrenched behind its ideological defences and possessed by the idea of maintaining its power the Brezhnev era is an impediment in the way of the computer age.

Soviet economic problems, unresolved but acknowledged to exist, are forcing Moscow to resort to foreign policy measures to relieve the burden, including a more flexible approach towards the West.

Richard Löwenthal in his foreign policy review also took the "compulsion to practise coexistence" as his point of departure.

The post-revolutionary, conservative Kremlin leadership is no longer bent on wishful thinking and revolutionary policies aimed at putting the world out of joint.

In view of the nuclear balance of terror and the uncertainty of its Eastern European buffer zone it is for the most part engaged in conventional power politics, promptly exploiting the other side's weaknesses but basing its moves primarily on security considerations.

Political ramifications of Peace Prize dangerous enterprise as policy towards the Eastern Bloc.

Continued from page 1

Domestic criticism of aspects of Ostpolitik such as the circumstances of the Chancellor's recent visit to the Soviet Union cannot be offset by the weight of world opinion. It is, when all is said and done, the ways and means that matter.

Which brings us back to the problems of a Peace Prize, problems that are

At home the Soviet leaders are intent on maintaining Party power; abroad priority is given to consolidation of Soviet possessions.

To illustrate this shift in emphasis in Soviet policy towards the West Löwenthal differentiated between Warsaw Pact targets as exemplified by the July 1966 Bucharest communiqué and the March 1969 Budapest declaration.

In 1966 Moscow still aimed at both gaining recognition of its Eastern European possessions and ensuring disintegration of the Western alliance.

The 1969 Budapest call for a European security conference also included a demand for acknowledgement of the Soviet sphere of influence but on this occasion there was no questioning the Western alliance and integration.

A number of motives may be adduced for the Soviet decision in favour of priority for consolidation of power while at the same time being prepared to pursue a policy of detente.

First, Czechoslovakia again underlined the crisis-prone nature of the Soviet sphere of influence. The invasion of Czechoslovakia stripped Kremlin demands for a dissolution of military blocs of all credibility.

Second, Bonn's Ostpolitik presented the Soviet Union with the opportunity of gaining fresh status quo advantages in return for concessions on Berlin and good behaviour towards Europe as a whole.

Third, the return of China to the world stage compelled the Kremlin to seek safeguards for its sphere of influence in Eastern Europe and also to reappraise its relationship with the West.

Fourth, the Soviet Union's worldwide overcommitment began to make its presence felt, primarily in the form of an economic burden. Economic bottlenecks proved increasingly problematic as consumer demand in the Soviet home market increased and the technological gap widened.

The desire for a degree of relief from the burden of overcommitment without surrender of terrain is the main motive behind Soviet foreign policy at present. Both aims would be enhanced by the holding of a European security conference.

A conference would on the one hand provide a welcome forum for establishing advantageous economic links with the West. On the other it would help to further international recognition of the German Democratic Republic.

Richard Löwenthal ended on an optimistic note. In Europe today, he concluded, security by means of relaxation of tension has come to be a distinct possibility.

Detente alone, he added, was not enough. It must be combined with loyalty to the Western alliance and defence preparedness.

A further proviso would seem necessary. The security Löwenthal means is that of Western Europe. It is of little assistance to Eastern Europe, which remains firmly incorporated in the power-political system of the Soviet Union.

But not even the subtlest of renunciations of the use of force at a security conference can make much difference to this state of affairs. For that the time has yet to come.

Andreas Kohlschütter
(Die Zeit, 22 October 1971)

Soviet statesmen on the move

Frankfurter Allgemeine

Soviet Premier Kosygin's latest comes in the middle of a succession of political visits by himself, President Podgorny and, even more significantly, General Secretary Brezhnev.

Recent visits have been paid to India, Yugoslavia, Algeria, Morocco and France. At the end of this month Leonid Brezhnev is to visit France and Alexei Kossygin to tour Norway and Denmark.

What accounts for this sudden spate of Soviet diplomatic activity? In a number of cases it is a matter, in formal terms, return visits. Even then the timing is significant.

Moscow evidently feels it now advisable to demonstrate manifold foreign policy activity. It would like to be in a position of strength in conducting the variously inaugurated talks with Washington to come to an agreement.

It would like to pave the way for the European security conference on which it is so keen. Anxiety in a number of countries lest the Federal Republic might take itself too much towards the Soviet Union might result in backlash. Moscow would like to demonstrate its reliability with this in mind.

At the same time it is hard to visualize these hectic exchanges, including, of course, visits to the Soviet Union, not having been influenced to some considerable extent by the unexpected announcement of another visit altogether, President Nixon's visit to Peking.

In view of this American initiative the Soviet Union would like to underline its own position in the world, with particular attention being paid to the Mediterranean region.

A contributory factor may well be that it is proving more difficult than was originally envisaged to secure effective bases in the Mediterranean. It will have seemed worthwhile to lend a diplomatic hand.

The wave of Soviet diplomatic activity need not, then, necessarily be viewed as reflection of Moscow's strength. It might well be attributable to anxiety and uncertainty, a response to developments and moves by others rather than a first move.

Even so, there can be no disregarding the immense military strength that in the final analysis backs up Soviet moves.

(Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung für Deutschland, 19 October 1971)

The German Tribune

Publisher: Friedrich Reinecke. Editor-in-Chief: Eberhard Wagner. Assistant Editor-in-Chief: Otto Helm. Editor: Alexander Amann. English language sub-editor: Geoffrey Pong. Distribution Manager: Georgine von Pallas. Friedrich Reinecke Verlag GmbH, 53 Bonn, Auslands-Postfach 78. Tel.: 22 61 51. Fax: 22 61 52. 52 14733. Bonn bureau: Konrad Kadmon. 53 Adenauerallee, 53 Bonn. Tel.: 22 61 51. Fax: 22 61 52.

Advertising rates list No. 8 - Annual subscription DM 25. Printed by Krieger Bros. and Verlagsgesellschaft, Hamburg-Stellingen. Distributed in USA by: MASS MAILINGS, Inc. 840 West 12th Street, New York, N.Y. 10011.

All articles which THE GERMAN TRIBUNE reprints are published in cooperation with the editorial staffs of leading newspapers of the Federal Republic of Germany. They are complete translations of the original text. The GERMAN TRIBUNE also publishes THE GERMAN TRIBUNE Quarterly Review, a selection from German periodicals.

In all correspondence please quote your subscription number which appears on the upper right of your address.

PEACE PRIZE

Norwegian parliament honours Chancellor Willy Brandt

On 21 October 1969 Willy Brandt, German Chancellor of the Federal Republic, was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace. The clash of dates is pure coincidence but it does show clearly how little time it has taken for Willy Brandt to make his mark on world politics.

Willy Brandt's efforts to carry out the seemingly impossible task of bridging the points in common between the East and West of divided postwar Europe in order to "make peace more certain" are not confined to the time he has been Chancellor of the Federal Republic, two years on 21 October this year.

They stretch back to the time when Brandt became Mayor of Berlin, when he began to reflect on ways of overcoming the division of the City, unable to change the facts, but this did not make him into a fighter of the Cold War.

There was nothing he or anyone else could do about the building of the Berlin Wall in 1961. He, too, had to live through the violent division of the City, unable to change the facts, but this did not make him into a fighter of the Cold War. It strengthened his resolve to find a way that was not strewn with illusions in which the plight of the Germans in their country divided by concrete and barbed wire could be alleviated.

Willy Brandt's Ostpolitik as Chancellor which earned him the Nobel Prize has its origins in his Berlin days.

As governing Mayor of Berlin he negotiated an agreement on passes allowing East Berliners to cross the Wall. As Chancellor he attempted to make the subtle demarcation line between the two Germanies and the two halves of Europe less relevant.

The progress along this road can be charted out in five different stages, each corresponding to a name on the map - East, Kassel, Warsaw, Moscow and Bonn.

The way was cleared for the Erfurt meeting, the first official pan-German gathering since 1947, by Willy Brandt's statement of government policy on 28 October 1969. Among other things this speech recognised the existence of the German Democratic Republic, stating: "Twenty years after the founding of the Federal Republic and the GDR we must regard the German nation splitting even further, we must work towards a regulated peaceful co-existence and aim for unification of the two parts.

"This is not only significant for Germany but is also important for peace in Europe and for the relationship between East and West."

This basic idea runs like a thread through all Willy Brandt's speeches and actions.

At his meeting with the GDR Prime Minister Willi Stoph on 19 March in Erfurt Willy Brandt said: "The situation demands that we search for spheres in which it is possible to make progress towards peace on behalf of the people of Germany."

In Erfurt he saw at first hand the spontaneous unanimous expression of joy and hope as the crowd cheered "Willy, Willy" underlining the fact that another central feature of his policies is of vital significance and must remain in his renunciation of force policy based on the territorial status quo. He said: "I shall continue to base my actions on the continuing, living reality of one German nation."

The second stage on the intra-German road in the attempt to break down confrontation between East and West step by step was marked by the meeting in Kassel of Stoph and Brandt on 21 May 1970. Kassel in fact marked a step in the wrong direction since the GDR delegation insisted obstinately on recognition of the other German State in international law.

What remained after Kassel was that twenty-point programme which the Bonn government placed as a suggestion before the GDR for improving relations between the two countries.

Point one reads: "The FRG and the GDR, whose constitutions both aim at the reunification of the country, should in the interests of peace, the future and the cohesion of the country devise a treaty defining and regulating the relationship that exists between the two countries, improving the connections between the people and the States and contributing towards removing existing disadvantages."

Even before the pan-German meeting at government level in Kassel preparations had been made for the treaty on the renunciation of the use or threat of force between the Federal Republic and the USSR at the West German/Soviet talks between Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and this country's representative State Secretary Egon Bahr. This was announced by Chancellor Brandt in his government policy statement and was signed in Moscow on 12 August 1970.

From Moscow Brandt spoke to people in this country on television, expressing once again his basic motivation for his policy of detente and peace with the East.

Brandt said: "Twenty-five years after the surrender of Hitler's destroyed Third Reich and fifteen years after Konrad Adenauer resumed diplomatic relations with Moscow it is high time to re-establish our relationship with the East. The basis must be a mutual unlimited renunciation of force springing from the political situation that now exists in Europe."

"Our national interests do not permit us to stand between the West and East. Our country needs cooperative ventures, agreement with the West and conciliation with the East."

And the next stage, the German-Polish negotiations that led to the signing of the Treaty of Warsaw on 7 December 1970 had also been mentioned in advance by the statement of government policy in October 1969.

Perhaps it was that gesture of Willy Brandt's at the memorial to the victims of the GDR for improving relations between the two countries.

(Photo: J. H. Darchinger)

Point one reads: "The FRG and the GDR, whose constitutions both aim at the reunification of the country, should in the interests of peace, the future and the cohesion of the country devise a treaty defining and regulating the relationship that exists between the two countries, improving the connections between the people and the States and contributing towards removing existing disadvantages."

Even before the pan-German meeting at government level in Kassel preparations had been made for the treaty on the renunciation of the use or threat of force between the Federal Republic and the USSR at the West German/Soviet talks between Russian Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and this country's representative State Secretary Egon Bahr. This was announced by Chancellor Brandt in his government policy statement and was signed in Moscow on 12 August 1970.

From Moscow Brandt spoke to people in this country on television, expressing once again his basic motivation for his policy of detente and peace with the East.

Brandt said: "Twenty-five years after the surrender of Hitler's destroyed Third Reich and fifteen years after Konrad Adenauer resumed diplomatic relations with Moscow it is high time to re-establish our relationship with the East. The basis must be a mutual unlimited renunciation of force springing from the political situation that now exists in Europe."

"Our national interests do not permit us to stand between the West and East. Our country needs cooperative ventures, agreement with the West and conciliation with the East."

And the next stage, the German-Polish negotiations that led to the signing of the Treaty of Warsaw on 7 December 1970 had also been mentioned in advance by the statement of government policy in October 1969.

Perhaps it was that gesture of Willy Brandt's at the memorial to the victims of

Text of Nobel Peace Prize Committee citation

During the whole postwar period the unsolved German Problem has posed a latent danger for peace. In this time there have been many efforts to counter tension in this dangerous sphere with a spirit of detente.

The Nobel Committee of Stortinget, the Norwegian parliament, has this day awarded the Peace Prize to Federal Chancellor Willy Brandt. By this choice the committee has tried to execute the intentions expressed in the testament of Alfred Nobel.

As the leader of the Federal Republic of Germany and in the name of the German people Willy Brandt has stretched out a hand in reconciliation between peoples who were for a long time enemies.

In a spirit of goodwill he has achieved extraordinary results in paving the way for peace in Europe. Political and military detente between East and West Europe are prerequisites for peaceful development.

The Committee ascribes great significance to the fact that as Foreign Minister of the Federal Republic from 1966 and then as Chancellor from 1969 Willy Brandt in motion initiatives for detente.

The Committee takes as evidence the signing of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and the Treaties Renouncing the Use or Threat of Force with both Poland and the Soviet Union.

Moreover the Committee begs to give a reminder of Willy Brandt's efforts to guarantee the people of West Berlin the basic rights of personal security and freedom of movement.

Willy Brandt sees the strengthening of cooperation in Western Europe as an integral binding part of a peace plan for the whole Europe. With regard to the strengthening of the economic and political unit of Western Europe the Federal Chancellor has also seized vital initiatives.

The Nobel Committee considers the whole of his work as a fundamental contribution towards making a peaceful development not only in Europe, but also in the whole world, possible.

(Unofficial translation)

the Warsaw ghetto, which surprised so many people, that impressed the world more than anything else - and the Nobel Committee, too, Brandt's humble kneeling was a symbol of the new Germany, a sign of the policies that were required in a divided Europe and a mark of Willy Brandt's personal concept.

In his televised broadcast to the German people Brandt brought out the point of the agreement with these words: "The Treaty of Warsaw is to mark the end of an era of suffering and sacrifices which belongs to an evil past. It is to create a bridge between the two States and the two peoples. It should pave the way along which divided families can walk towards being reunited with one another."

The latest stage in Willy Brandt's efforts to "make peace more certain" is his journey to Qrenda in the Crimea between 16 and 18 September this year to meet the General Secretary of the Central Committee of the Russian Communist Party Leonid Brezhnev.

Not only was this journey greeted in different quarters with sceptical and mistrustful reactions here and abroad. For many it would be a nightmare for Germans and Russians to come to terms.

Both in the joint communiqué and in public statements and diplomatic announcements after his return Willy Brandt tried to clarify the motives for his journey to meet Brezhnev in the face of these suspicions.

Reinhard Appel
(Süddeutsche Zeitung, 21 October 1971)

The Nobel Peace Prize

The Nobel Prize for Peace has been awarded to 64 persons, and twelve times to international organisations in the course of the past seventy years, with the exception for the war years.

The International Red Cross Committee has received the coveted award five times. Of the individuals who have received the award there were fifteen Norwegians, nine Frenchmen and seven Germans.

The first man to receive the Peace Prize was the founder of the Red Cross, Jean Henri Dunant, in 1901. Among other award winners are Theodore Roosevelt, Austen Chamberlain, Frank Kellogg, Ralph Bunche, Albert Schweitzer, George C. Marshall, Dag Hammarskjöld and Dr Martin Luther King.

Willy Brandt is the 56th German to receive a Nobel Prize in one of the six categories awarded every year.

The last German to be awarded a Peace Prize from the Norwegian parliament was the political commentator

Carl von Ossietzky in 1935. He was unable to receive the prize, since he had been incarcerated in a concentration camp by the National Socialists. In 1938 he died in captivity as the result of the privations he had suffered in the camp.

Previous Peace Prize recipients from Germany were Reichs Foreign Minister Gustav Stresemann in 1926, who shared the prize with the French educationalist and champion of the peace movement Ferdinand Buisson.

The prize is always awarded on 10 December, the birthday of Alfred Nobel. Awards are made on the recommendation of a select committee from the Norwegian parliament.

The members of this committee are sworn to absolute secrecy about the names on their short list. The award is made in the Main Hall of Oslo University. Recipients wear an informal dark suit. The committee explains exhaustively the reasons for its choices and the first to congratulate award winners is the Norwegian king.

ARMED FORCES

General discusses complex factors of Innere Führung

Süddeutsche Allgemeine

In recent years a number of books of varying quality have been issued dealing with the armed forces and their position within a democracy.

Younger writers more than any other group have apportioned praise and criticism according to their intellectual point of view but they have not been able to rely adequately enough on empirical examination when reaching their judgment.

But, to be quite fair, the writer of this book is also unable to do this. General von Iseemann first describes the origins of Innere Führung (Inner Leadership) and its basic principles and then outlines the form it takes in the services.

He discusses its role in instruction, in soldiers' political activity, the personnel situation and welfare services among other spheres before turning to similar innovations abroad. He mentions in particular the Swiss, French, American and Russian armed forces.

The style and execution of the book reveal an experienced and committed officer who fought successfully for the implementation of Inner Leadership in both theory and practice especially as head of the instruction and training section of the First Armoured Brigade and as Defence Ministry spokesman.

What Iseemann has to add to the current discussion on Inner Leadership, a debate that has recently become more lively once again, is on the whole a skillful survey of the educational side of military leadership.

He succeeds in clearing up a number of misunderstandings, explaining concepts and elucidating the efforts of those people in the fifties who formed the idea of a "citizen in uniform", an idea that to this very day has remained unchallenged by serious alternatives.

In his introduction Count Kleimanns-egg claims that the book contains mainly what could be described as the real situation within the armed forces but this is only true to a limited extent.

Instead, the book concentrates on what should be the real situation within the armed forces. This feature alone is of merit as the Defence Ministry has still not issued a new fully revised Handbook of Inner Leadership since the first one appeared in 1957.

Iseemann rightly understands Inner Leadership as a type of military leadership adapted to the changes in outside life and as a mental process whose aims and content are determined by the political role of the armed forces, Basic Law and the laws governing military service. Its purpose is to ensure the continuing existence of our democratic system.

Iseemann stresses the dynamic character of Inner Leadership — a feature not given adequate attention by critics up to now — though he deals too little with the contradiction between inner freedom and the protection of latitude for outer action.

This also applies to the tense relationship between civilian society and military life that has never been fully overcome and can only be tempered by integrating the forces into state and society.

Iseemann has written his readable book primarily as a practitioner. No strict academic yardsticks should therefore be applied to his work.

For obvious reasons his criticism often has to be read from between the lines even though many of the subjects he deals with certainly deserved harsher treatment.

Sometimes he only gives half the story or conceals a matter entirely. He claims that "the positive forces within the Bundeswehr" (who are the positive forces within the Bundeswehr?) are loyal to their employers and support the ideas they are called upon to defend. This may be true but he supplies no evidence for this important statement.

His discussion of the armed forces' "view of the enemy" is also too short. He should have mentioned how poorly informed the military leadership is about how the subject is currently being treated in the political education given by company commanders.

There is a lot to support the view that the material now used is still that of the fifties which is hardly likely to comply with the present policy of détente.

Another chapter that should be mentioned is the position of the armed forces commanders and their deputies to the whole question of Inner Leadership.

This does not mean what they say in public from time to time but is a question of their true commitment and real understanding of the reform proposals of Count Baudissin and his supporters.

Iseemann cautiously points out the "varying views" of ministers. It would have been more appropriate to point out that the political leadership's hesitancy (for various reasons) to study the armed forces' ideas contributed decisively to the present state of affairs where the principles of Inner Leadership have not been implemented.

School for conscientious objectors opened in Weserbergland

Kieler Nachrichten

On 4 October, for the first time in the history of military service in this country, young conscientious objectors started a course at an old gliding school on the 1th in the Weserbergland preparing them for the work that lay ahead.

With the opening of the 1th Civilian Service School the government is anticipating the passing of a Bill at the end of the year that proposes that members of the service should be taught about its role and functions, told their rights and obligations and given the practical information necessary for their future work.

The first three seminars taking place this year will provide important information on the teaching methods eventually to be employed at the school.

Heinrich Cronow, who is head of the school as well as head of the Holzminden local district educational authority, does not plan to run his school as a traditional place of learning or even as a vocational training college for occupations concerned with social welfare.

A first-aid course is the only fixed part of training according to the views at far put forward by Cronow and the Federal Commissioner for the Civilian Replacement Service, Hans Iven.

Other aspects of the courses, such as their length, will be decided after discussions with the conscientious objectors attending the first three trial seminars.

Social policy and its background will be one subject to be taught to the young men at the school, though on a purely scientific basis.

A large amount of time will be spent discussing ways of ensuring peace. Guest lecturers will explain the necessary preconditions for this before full-time teachers take over.

In future, teaching at the school will be conducted on a three-stream system. The pupils will be prepared for service in three parallel courses.

No more than eighty places are available at one time, the school's head states. The pupils will have to live together as at a boarding school and working groups will be arranged according to what previous education they have had.

Hans Iven states that some fifty per cent of all conscientious objectors have passed their Abitur school-leaving examination. Only thirteen per cent of young men entering the armed forces have this qualification.

When opening the school on the 1th, Hans Iven stated that further schools of this type would be built in the Federal Republic. The dimensions of this plan become clear when it is realised that the annual figure of people claiming conscientious objection in the next few years is estimated at about thirty thousand. If past experience is anything to go by, eighty per cent of this total will have their claims upheld.

Rolf Spitzhüll

(Kieler Nachrichten 19 October 1971)

given precise form and are still the subject of a violent clash of opinions.

The new and mutually related plans now being discussed for changing the structure of the armed forces, armed forces personnel and training and instruction have unquestionably encouraged the Bundeswehr leadership to consider their own plans for reform.

Their aim is to make the Bundeswehr of the seventies more competitive in the face of civilian concerns. The armed forces and private industry would be able to exchange personnel more easily than is the case today and officers would be given better training by means of modern leadership methods so that the necessary qualified new blood would be guaranteed.

For the time being we must wait and see whether implementing these plans all at once would not place too much strain on the armed forces at the present stage of social change.

Whatever the case, the reform plans must be accompanied by a new concept of political education for the armed forces, one that will be valid in the future too. This is shown in Iseemann's book.

All improvements in organisation — adapted to the needs of the modern industrial society — will remain fragmentary if today's younger generation is not cured of its attitude of opposition towards the State (illustrated in part by the increasing number of conscientious objectors — the 1971 total was twice as high as the 1970 at over thirty thousand) and convinces the young of the value of our social system and the fact that military service is a way of ensuring peace.

Hans Adolf Jacobsen

(Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung für Deutschland, 11 October 1971)

All round knowledge called for among potential staff officers

Every autumn a number of Army captains embark on a course prior to selection examination to determine whether they are to become staff officers. Just before Christmas six of the candidates will be told that they have the necessary qualifications for a career as a staff officer.

The most extensive test of knowledge any professional group in the Federal Republic has to undergo last autumn is the examination for the examination of potential staff officers. Just before Christmas six of the candidates will be told that they have the necessary qualifications for a career as a staff officer.

Preliminary courses begin in January at the divisional level. Apart from lectures on subjects like the principles of Russian land forces in attack and defence and the way officers should act the men are given important tips for subsequent primary study courses.

Written examinations and sports tests take place during the summer and in the late autumn candidates are ordered to report for three weeks to the Lettow-Beck barracks in Hamburg.

"I've never seen so many captains busily polishing their shoes," one of the men attending the course stated. The candidate's appearance is also judged. Trodden-down heels and badly worn dirty uniforms can impair a career.

The examinees always have their books and writing equipment tidily arranged in front of them as the instructors have written down figures in their notebooks.

Poker-faced they listen to what the examinees have to say about certain subjects ("Do the existence and dignity of an extra-parliamentary opposition bear poor testimony to political education in the Federal Republic of Germany?") or collect their sometimes uncompleted test papers.

Technical problems such as the functioning of pistons in a hydraulic press have to be solved alongside extensive tactical work such as the discussion of the defence role of the reinforced 162 Army Grenadier Battalion.

But the "Double Your Money" atmosphere does not become evident until the general knowledge questions are asked — "What is the purpose of the Kennedy Round?" or, "What was the name of the composer who died in 1826 and who set Heinrich Heine's Waltüren to music?"

The ten per cent of examinees who receive more than 129 points receive a certificate for the rest of their life and are given unimportant posts before being pensioned off at fifty.

These "failures" can however expect another crack at the examination ten years later and half of them pass in the second time.

But they cannot embark upon a career as staff officer which is one of the main reasons for these examinations. The state has no more than 75 posts against the 100 who have no more than 75 points against the 100 and even then only the sixty best are finally chosen. The upper reaches of the armed services are then open to them.

This is the one source of injustice in an otherwise extraordinarily fair examination procedure.

Candidates passing the staff officer examination and yet not qualifying for the general staff can count on becoming lieutenant-colonel rank.

The captains who find themselves in this position can console themselves with the thought that Rommel (who had a general staff training) would probably have been pensioned off as a lieutenant-colonel in the Bundeswehr.

Horst Günther Töhlke

(Die Welt, 15 October 1971)

POLITICS
CSU contented at home but elsewhere under criticism

Süddeutsche Zeitung

Declarations of pride, contentment and even self-righteousness were all heard when the Christian Social Union (CSU) officially celebrated its 25th anniversary on 17 October, though the party was actually founded on 8 January 1946. A selective minority, though not the least mass of the six hundred delegates to the Congress, will be plagued with doubts when, in the midst of this jubilee, they think of what has become of the CSU since Dr Josef Müller received permission from the Allies to found the party.

There are good reasons for these doubts. After a quarter of a century of extremely agitated history the CSU has been voters than ever before in Bavaria and beyond the borders of that Federal State it has an image that could hardly be less satisfactory to the party.

Observers, apart from party members, are surprisingly unanimous in the view that the CSU has become a right-wing party that is further to the right than the Christian Democrats.

The CSU's authoritarian leadership and its authoritarian bearing and the party's failure into German nationalism after the particularly federalistic and European are proved by too many quotes for anything to be dismissed as North German prejudice.

Though criticism from outside sources may be biting, at home the CSU can sit back contentedly. Amidst the other parties with their infighting and rebellious movements the CSU appears a bastion of importunability.

Perhaps it is this almost uncanny calm within the CSU, broken only once by a general about a local district wiped out by a local government reform, that appears suspicious to many people both inside and outside the party.

Of course it must be admitted that in a party of dignitaries such as the CSU there has never been a particularly strongly developed tendency to indulge in political discussion, especially at grass-roots level.

Decisions of this type once used to take place in the higher reaches of the party at least. Party life was uncomfortable and vexatious, though extremely honest together with their supporters.

When Josef Müller and Alois Hundsdörfer, a state President or when later the right-wing Petra group clashed with the liberals in the great fight of principle over education policy and a young man named Josef Strauss made a name for himself as a liberal.

Today on the other hand observers gain an impression that the personal intrigue and animosity found in every party has increased. The only difference now is that these quarrels are no longer based on varying positions of principle.

Whereas party differences could be smoothed over by naming different groups in the past, clashes in policy now have to be expressed in terms of personality. On one side is Anton Jaumann, on the other Franz Heubl. On the one side there is Ludwig Huber and on the other Hans. The CSU is also proud of having problems with its left wing, unlike the Christian Democrats.

CSU leader Franz Josef Strauss, Gertrud Goppel, wife of Alfons Goppel, Prime Minister of Bavaria and Richard Stücklen, leader of the CSU parliamentary party, waiting for the arrival of Rainer Barzel, at the CSU party conference.

(Photo: Sven Simon)

Perhaps the CSU will have to ask itself whether this is really a reason to be proud. At any rate there has been a remarkable development within a party whose founders adopted the word "Social" in its title, against the advice of Konrad Adenauer.

The official party left wing is formed today only by the Christian Social employees group under Bavarian Labour Minister Fritz Pirkel, a body whose political influence is minimal.

To prove that the party is not hostile to the working population, Franz Josef Strauss has had to say that the CSU considers blue-collar workers, white-collar workers and management as "equally valuable" as "the temporary inactivity of refuse disposal affects ordered life more than the absence of a top manager".

When young CSU politicians, mainly those from Munich, occasionally suggest advances should be made in the social welfare field they are either tolerated as court jesters or attacked by Bayenkurier, the party newspaper. They are unable to change the party line.

It seems to be significant that only outsiders and a number of young members attempt to arouse discussions of party principles. But among these two groups there are few people who would

CDU/CSU commission to be set up to choose chancellor candidate

The CSU executive stated at its recent party congress in Munich that it was not prepared at this early stage to agree to Christian Democrat leader Rainer Barzel becoming the CDU/CSU's joint candidate for the Chancellorship.

Party boss Franz Josef Strauss told the press after the executive meeting that the CDU and CSU would not nominate their candidate for another three or four months yet. Strauss and Barzel have agreed to set up a joint commission to decide the issue.

The CSU will be represented on the commission by party leader Strauss, Richard Stücklen (the chairman of the parliamentary party), Ludwig Huber (the floor leader in the Bavarian Provincial Assembly), deputy leaders Werner Dollinger, Hermann Höcherl and Franz Heubl, Leo Wagner and the Bavarian Minister of Labour, Fritz Pirkel.

Strauss expects that the CDU will appoint their members of the commission at the party's next executive session.

Strauss stated that the joint commission would first of all fix the main details of the policies that the two Union parties would adopt after 1973.

A shadow cabinet would then be drawn up on the basis of this working programme and the final step would be the appointment of the CDU/CSU's candidate for the Chancellorship.

Strauss avoided giving any clear answer to journalists' questions whether the CSU saw any alternative to Barzel as Chancellor candidate after his election as leader of the Christian Democrats.

He merely stated that his party would claim the number two position in any government headed by the CDU/CSU if a Christian Democrat politician was nominated as Chancellor candidate.

The CSU did not, however, claim the Vice-Chancellorship, he added, as this demand could impair any coalition talks after the next elections.

Asked whether the whole complicated nomination procedure was of no more than purely formal character, Strauss replied, "You could sooner milk a billy-goat than get more information from me."

(Süddeutsche Zeitung, 16 October 1971)

Strauss and Barzel prepare their strategy for the next few months politik, economic policy and information policy in their speeches.

Strauss accused Chancellor Willy Brandt of having promised more democracy though showing more intolerance than any of his predecessors.

Strauss does not believe that the aims of Soviet foreign policy has changed. With its Ostpolitik, he said, the government was running the risk of surrendering positions that could never be regained and of getting into a blind alley.

Ratifying the treaties with Russia and Poland would bring disaster, he added, and not ratifying them would cause the climate between Bonn and Moscow to be cooler than ever before.

There was no basic alternative to the previous policy which the CDU/CSU and SPD had pursued jointly up to 1969, Strauss said. The wave of international recognition for the German Democratic Republic resulting from government policy in Bonn was already overshadowing countries like Austria, Switzerland and France, he continued.

Barzel had also warned beforehand that present government policy was loosening ties with the West, consolidating those with the East and disturbing the European balance.

There had been a peace policy before Brandt, he said, and there would be one after Brandt. Barzel promised that a CDU/CSU government would prevent us from becoming Socialist at home and more dependent on the Soviet Union abroad.

Whereas Barzel only devoted a small part of his speech to the economy stating that "galloping inflation" was destroying reforms introduced by the CDU/CSU, Strauss demanded an end to what he described as the nonsense of freely floating exchange rates.

He did not believe in tax increases, he said, if they were only meant to fill the holes caused by the government's policy of inflation.

The economy would be healthy and vigorous "without the miracle doctor and his two ministers", Strauss added. But it would now take several years to end the state of excessive optimism concerning the future, induced by political drugs, and return to the path of ascent that was marked by sweat and toil.

(Kieler Nachrichten, 18 October 1971)

THINGS SEEN

Mannheim Festival concentrates on home-produced cinema

Even the warm summer sunshine over the city was unable to hide the fact that the catchphrase of "total information" coined three years ago as an anti-ideological slogan is proving to be more and more of a boomerang.

The spread of democracy throughout the Mannheim Film Week has created a dilemma that will be difficult to solve. The admirable intention of letting everyone and everything take part has led to nothing else but a pluralistic film bazaar, a confusing mish-mash of professionalism and dilettantism.

Its flood of celluloid sweeps away the features that should be indispensable, the intervals during which people could ponder over a film and discuss it with their friends.

It is plain that no mere mortal was able to concentrate on the 128 films from 23 countries shown at 67 performances during the six days of the festival.

A far more important objection is that many films that do not stand out at first glance were suffocated by the avalanche of the non-stop programme.

This autumn Mannheim confirmed what Oberhausen had suggested in the spring — a lot of the revolutionary elan has slowly got into a rut and a general apathy has taken its place.

The sobering realisation that no revolution can be achieved among a working class with petit bourgeois pretensions has generally led to a calming-down process.

Mannheim's Film Week calls itself international but for the last three years at least it has become more and more of a forum for young West German film-makers.

This narrow-minded nationalism is hardly likely to prove worthwhile enough to attract foreign film directors to book the long trip to Mannheim.

The deep-seated polarisation process that is affecting many branches of daily life in the Federal Republic and that was suggested at last year's Film Week was this year confirmed.

On the one hand there were those directors who were committed to changing the social system and used the cinema as a means of bringing about this change by providing the necessary political ideas.

On the other hand is the group of aesthetes who are only interested in form and ignore content, usually as an expression of their passive protest against a society measuring everything according to performance.

The two sides are irreconcilably opposed. The one group is scorned as propagandists and agitators while the other group is described as pursuing art for art's sake.

There seems to be little likelihood even in the most distant future of the two extremes reaching an understanding or forming a synthesis.

Two examples may serve here — Where Our Strength Lies by Adolf Winkelmann and Gerhard Büttenbender and Wim Wenders' Summer in the City.

Winkelmann and Büttenbender describe experiments conducted by a number of educationalists. Schoolchildren were told to act as though they were working in a factory so as to open their eyes to contradictions and situations of conflict.

This was done with extreme objectivity and calm. No additional refinement was needed to make the process more noticeable. No artistic tricks detracted from the central theme — the solidarity of the working people. Sober information is dominant, creative effect is not permitted.

Wim Wenders' film was completely different. He has nothing to say, or at any rate he has no story to tell. His 145-minute long film provides an epilogue to a crime story that took place before the film began.

Static camera positions and long picture sequences almost completely lacking in action and expressing only gestures, moods and modes of behaviour provide the film with an austere consistent style which makes it an extreme case of the esoteric cinema with the stress on formal appearance.

Among the eleven films given their first run that competed for the Grand Prix at Mannheim there was no film that could be awarded the victor's crown without reservation.

As the jury awarded the main prize to the Argentinian film The Road to the Death of Old Reales by Gerardo Vallejo this verdict can be felt to be a general token of esteem for the whole Latin American film industry. And that should gain unanimous approval.

Henning Hammssen (Hannover, Allgemeine, 12 October 1971)

A scene from the experimental film Where Our Strength Lies by Adolf Winkelmann and Gerhard Büttenbender (Photo: Adolf Winkelmann)

Disappointing Berlin Festival needs a shot in the arm

Walther Schumieding, the director of the Berlin Festival, had wanted to spread the attractions of this year's event over a longer period though by the time the Festival was over it could be seen that there were not so many attractions to spread.

There were, it is true, a good number of interesting performances by foreign theatrical companies but it would be rather euphemistic to claim that Berlin's theatres had won great renown this autumn.

The Volksbühentheater were unable to provide a premiere for this year's Festival. Berlin's Deutsche Oper was not particularly successful with Aribert Reimann's Mohr, already seen at Schwetzingen, or with Hans Werner Henze's Natascha Ungeheuer.

Boleslaw Barlog's contribution to the Festival programme was a staunch and idyllic production of Grabbe's Scherz, Satire, Ironie und tiefere Bedeutung that certainly did not take advantage of all the opportunities offered by the play. Barlog seems to have lost all ambition of featuring on Berlin's cultural scene.

Barlog's theatre was plagued by bad luck. Beckett's production of his own

Happy Days did not live up to the promise of last year's successful production by the Nobel Prize winner.

Hans Hollmann was little more fortunate in his treatment of Peter Hacks' Hölderlin. During the Empedocles scene he sent twenty Hölderlins on stage to provide a heated expressionist effect.

But Hollmann's tendency to make the actors break up the text, as it were, and speak their parts against the linguistic flow is gradually becoming an affliction. The figure of Hölderlin, to whom Hans-Peter Hallwachs gave an all too casual outline from the very outset, was not interpreted as the play itself intended.

This Hölderlin tottered about stage like a cretin at the end and gave no indication that a revolutionary poet was taking the last step into the voluntary prison of simulated lunacy as the playwright wanted.

It was also puzzling why Hollmann drowned the narrator's uneven verses in music. The production laboriously approached the finale in a state somewhat between popular ballad and operatic parody, reaching it after more than four hours and far too late. By this time the audience was too exhausted to express its approval or disapproval.

The rather anaemic Festival received a shot in the arm in the Deutschlandhalle where the Théâtre de Soleil performed Ariane Mnouchkine's production of the revolutionary spectacular 1789.

The producer and her passionately committed ensemble got to grips scabrously with their subject of the French Revolution and the events leading to it. The play was performed on high platforms before a gently rising auditorium of sometimes even among the audience, forcing it into the role of the people.

This was how production achieved the direct effect that good street theatre can have. The effect was heightened as the

Continued on page 7

A scene from Hans Werner Henze's Natascha Ungeheuer at the Berlin Festival (Photo: Ise Buhl)

THE ARTS

Fascinating Indian art museum opens in Berlin

In darkened rooms with black walls there hang brightly lit fragments of 1500 years of wall paintings from the Buddhist cave temples of East Turkestan. The magnificent colouring, brown, beige, ochre, grey, blue, is gripping.

A dancing queen with bared breasts, phantasies flying through the air, knights, herds, shepherds, monks and all the time the figure of the sitting Buddha. Legends are heaped on top of legends, scenes from Hell are mixed with images of Heaven.

The Turfan collection, unique of its kind in the world, is the main attraction at the Museum of Indian Art in the Berlin district of Berlin. The exhibition opened on 7 October.

The collection was brought to Berlin from Central Asia in the years prior to the First World War, but it has never been presented to the public in such a fascinating way before.

The Museum of Indian Art in Berlin is unique outside the Indian sub-continent, since Indian art generally speaking only forms one section of other museums. Although some of these objects d'art were brought to Berlin as long as the early nineteenth century this art museum is the newest of the fourteen museums belonging to the Preussischer Kulturbesitz.

The most valuable and most outstanding pieces were obtained by the museum between 1880 and 1914. The collection suffered heavy losses during the Second World War.

Sixty sculptures in stone, forty per cent of the Turfan frescoes and forty chests containing other Indian art treasures were destroyed in the air-raid shelter at the museum between 1880 and 1914. The collection suffered heavy losses during the Second World War.

The new building has no windows. Picked out by spotlights the objects d'art stand on like jewels on black velvet in the darkened rooms.

Some of the sculptures seem to float round the room since the black metal pillars on which they stand like trophies are lost in the dark.

"Architecture and design had to take a back seat in this case," said architect Fritz Bornemann. "Considering the great value of the works of art on show here it was essential that the public's gaze should not be distracted from them."

This has been achieved with great success. The way the rooms are laid out the art works on show seem to take on a magical attraction.

The permanent exhibition is complemented by two smaller shows on the lower gallery, where an art studio has been set up in which the objects are changed from time to time with no ballyhoo! The objects on show there are supposed to belong to groups of which only a few examples can be shown at the main exhibition.

In the gallery it is possible to see a display of pictures and writings of the archaeological work undertaken by the museum.

Shortly Herr Härtel, the museum director, will visit the historical hill of Sonkh in northern India for the sixth time. This is an area rich in the Indian culture and art of the third and fourth centuries A.D. He calls India an archaeologist's paradise. "You could go on digging there for a thousand years and still make important finds," he said.

Helmut Kotschenreuther (Kistner Nachrichten, 12 October 1971)

Lighting enhances Indian art treasures in Berlin museum

(Photo: Nina von Jaanson)

unique objects such as the goddess with a jackal's head and the three-headed bronze Vishnu.

In glass show-cases figures in ivory, of brass with pearls, green jade and gold material, royal veils, which make modern day brocade look peculiarly coarse can be seen.

Full lighting is thrown on a magnificently carved domestic shrine as tall as a man from the 18th century, and on the graphic hand-writing of pictures from the same period which take in knowledge of the gods, men and the underworld in red and gold.

A large room is filled with miniatures. These valuable illustrations come mainly from the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries. Complete legends explained in full in the excellent catalogue are recounted in these pictures. Love stories, jealous husbands and down-cast women, children at play, caravans, garden concerts, audiences at the Mogul court, polo games and amorous scenes — all flat, almost without perspective and in brilliant colours.

The Turfan frescoes — of the three hundred there are eighty on show — are not kept behind glass. They are protected from inquisitive fingers by a small pit. These date from the fifth to ninth centuries A.D. They are up to one and a half centimetres in thickness and are made of loam mixed with chaff or animal hair. One of those cave temples discovered in the first decade of this century north of the Deccan on the main highway to China and in which the frescoes were found was re-built according to the measurements taken from preserved paintings and fitted out with original frescoes.

For the time being the new building programme at Dahlem has been ended with the opening of this museum of Indian art. Other new buildings house the museums for ethnology, East Asian art and Islamic art.

Within a few years on this site a complex of modern buildings which does not look spectacular from the outside but which are fascinating on the inside has been built up forming not only a tourist attraction for Berlin but a mecca for experts from all over the world who never fail to be filled with amazement and generous with praise. For the opening of the museum of Indian art many internationally famous Indologists and archaeologists came to Berlin.

Liselotte Müller

(Hannoversche Allgemeine, 7 October 1971)

Mineralogists solve art jigsaw puzzle

Today this is known as the Meleager Sarcophagus. Dating from the third century AD this sarcophagus was the last resting place of a captain of the praetors, the Roman Emperor's bodyguard. It had to be reconstructed from three fragments and the three mineralogists were able to prove that the three sections belonged together.

One large fragment of it spent years in a museum in Kassel and two further sections were purchased in 1968 from a Frankfurt museum.

It turned out that the reliefs in white Greek marble obviously fitted together and together formed an artistically highly interesting and qualitatively very valuable piece of sculpture, perpetuating a scene from a Greek saga.

The hunter Meleager is seen slaying a wild boar before the eyes of the beautiful Atalanta and the Dioscuri twins.

Furthermore, this work of art, if correctly reconstructed, was an important link between late antique developments and mediaeval art.

Thus the job of proving that the pieces belonged to the same jigsaw puzzle was handed over to the mineralogists.

Their job was not easy, since the white marble did not show any typical giveaway signs and in Roman antiquity more than fifty types of white marble from Greece were used by artists.

The scientists had to find new ways of identifying the different pieces of sculpted stone. This they did by taking a number of measurements in which they calculated to a high degree of accuracy the size and forms of the crystals of chalk spar (which forms the marble), the dimensions of minute crystals of quartz and pyrites (an iron and sulphur compound) in the chalk spar, the segmentation of the pieces of stone and the quantities of foreign chemicals in the stone.

These data tallied but were not sufficient proof of the origins of this important artistic and historical find. And so these individual data were compared with other types of marble and the comparison was subjected to the theory of probability.

This showed that the similarity of the characteristics was so great that the probability of the pieces fitting together was more than 99 per cent.

With this proof — legal eagles would term it "probability verging on certainty" — the Meleager Sarcophagus was stamped as an example of the development of antique art.

Harald Steinhert

(Deutsches Allgemeines Sonntagsblatt, 10 October 1971)

Mannheim film honours

The Twentieth International Film Week at Mannheim ended when the Grand Prix, worth ten thousand Marks, was awarded to Gerardo Vallejo of Argentina for El camino hacia la muerte del viejo Reales.

Explaining its award, the international jury under Hungarian film critic Felix Marinsky stated that the film's great vitality provided an exemplary analysis of the Third World's fight against oppression and exploitation.

The Josef von Sternberg Prize for the most original film at the festival went to Shinsuke Ogawa's Peasants of the Second Fortress.

Another five films were awarded the coveted Film Ducat. Two West German films were among this number — Bruno — der Schwarze, es blies ein Jäger wohl in sein Horn by Lutz Eisholz and Akkordarbeiterin beim Osmar-Konzert by the West Berlin Film Collective.

Other films to receive this award were Mexico, La Revolution Congelada by Raymundo Gleyzer of Argentina, Part of the Family by American Paul Ronder and Ogiem by Andrzej Brozowski of Poland.

The International Evangelical Jury awarded its prizes to Werner Herzog's Land of Silence and Darkness and Where Our Strength Lies by Adolf Winkelmann and Gerhard Büttenbender.

The Catholic jury also awarded its prize, worth 1,000 Marks, to Land of Silence and Darkness. It awarded its prize for the best short film to the Polish work Ogiem.

The Argentinian film that received the Grand Prix was also given the award of international film critics (Fipresci).

(Lübecker Nachrichten, 12 October 1971)

MEDICINE

New artificial hormone helps sexual offenders

Approximately two thousand male patients, most of them in the Federal Republic, are currently being treated by a medicament inhibiting the sexual drive that, though not yet on the market, should help to cure sexual offenders.

The medical demand for supplies is rising daily. Judges here and in Switzerland are suspending sentences if the offender agrees to take this medicament.

Doctors and lawyers are however manoeuvring themselves into a tricky position. On the one hand, the medicament has not been registered at the Federal Health Bureau nor is its distribution yet permitted by that body.

On the other hand, there were 11,395 sexual offences involving children in 1969 and 5,457 cases of rape. In North Rhine-Westphalia alone 171 sexual murderers were arrested that year. Ten had already been sentenced once before for sexual offences. Four had appeared before the courts more than once.

Can this new inhibitive medicament achieve what prison sentences never do and psychiatric treatment only rarely? Can it control an uncontrollable sexual drive and cure the criminal behaviour of men with a perverse disposition?

Cypoterone is the name of the compound developed in the Schering works that counteracts the natural male sexual hormones as an anti-androgen. After a long period of animal experiments substance SH 80714 was released for hospital trials five years ago with relatively clear conscience, the manufacturers state.

Almost all the 547 human guinea-pigs were exhibitionists, homosexuals, paedophiles, prisoners serving a sentence for sexual offences and men who had sexually molested young boys or girls.

The experiment proved successful in 75 per cent of the cases. Their hypersexuality was braked and their overpowering sexual drive controlled. Psychotherapy was successful in these conditions. Many of the offenders could return to their families and be rehabilitated into society.

Since then the artificial hormone has been thought of as a miracle cure. Newspapers report that sexual offenders demand a course of treatment in order to remain free.

Fathers ask their family doctor for the medicament if their sons are going through a difficult stage of puberty. Mothers want it prescribed for their daughters so that they lose interest in an undesired lover.

One lady doctor is said to have given the medicament to a small child to stop it playing with its genital area. The "anti-sex pill" has achieved legendary fame in such a short time.

This fame is due in part to another lady doctor who has already held eighty lectures reporting on her success. She has also been engaged by the manufacturers to talk at the next international congress in Mexico.

But scientific journals do not allow their readers to have any doubts at all about the problems surrounding the use of this medicament.

Anti-androgens regulate the strength of the drive but they do not control the direction. Exhibitionists and homosexuals remain exhibitionists and homosexuals. When the substance wears off the sex drive may increase. Most patients relapse to their former condition.

But compared with surgical castration, permitted under certain circumstances since February 1970, the method involving the use of medicaments has the advantage of not being irrevocable.

For the same reason however treatment must be continued uninterruptedly over a long period. Apart from medical supervision, this demands that the patient appreciates the necessity of such action.

Past experience has shown that alcoholics and patients with psychoses or brain damage are unsuitable. The reactions of the mentally sick or sub-normal were unpredictable. Violent criminals with certain hereditary factors also have little prospect of being treated successfully.

Inferiority complexes and other defects in the patient's personality can also prove a hindrance as can the domestic environment and human relationships into which the rehabilitated offender returns.

Lasting side-effects resulting from this treatment have not been reported in the Federal Republic. Only in the United States where the substance is still in the examination stage has a case of jaundice been recorded.

Here too it is thought that the medicament could result in lasting damage if used for treating a young person. Anti-androgens do not only interrupt the maturing process but can also stop it permanently.

Experts generally believe that the use of the medicament can only be advocated where there is simultaneous psychiatric treatment. This does not mean that it will be restricted to one particular group of doctors — the rest could not be discriminated against in this way.

Could the substance get into the wrong hands because of doctors who will sign a prescription as a favour? A large-scale campaign is planned to guard against this by giving full information on the effects of the medicament.

The manufacturers admit that it could take years before every doctor has read the information. The flood of pharmaceutical literature sent to doctors through the post is nearly all consigned to waste-paper baskets.

Scientists and doctors are now testing what other uses this anti-androgen substance can be put to. Research has been conducted into its effects on acne and the tendency to miscarriages.

Effective contraception is required of young women are to be treated in this way as this artificial hormone can lead to a male foetus developing a disposition towards female organs.

Despite all reservations Schering's are now preparing an application for the medicament's registration for use in cases of pathological hypersexuality and criminal sexual behaviour.

It is reckoned that the anti-sex pill will be available at chemists in about a year's time.

The firm is being cautious in view of the great demand. The suspicion could otherwise arise that the registration was being brought forward because of the pressure from doctor's waiting-rooms.

Thes Winandy

(Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung für Deutschland, 13 October 1971)

Rudolf Virchow
(Photo: Staatsbibliothek Bonn)

Prominent doctor and archaeologist remembered

Rudolf Virchow, the great medical man who was a medical historian, the founder of cellular pathology and one of the founders of modern anthropology, did excellent work in three fields.

Apart from medicine it was the politics of his era that fascinated him. He was a member of the Prussian House of Deputies and, after 1871, the German Reichstag.

He was among the founder members of the Fortschritt (Progress) Party and was one of Bismarck's fiercest opponents during the constitutional conflict of 1861 and 1862.

But he switched sides to support the Chancellor during the Kulturkampf. As a liberal opponent of the Church he interpreted the word Kulturkampf as a fight for culture against the Church.

The full extent of his third field of activity is still largely unknown. He was in fact an important archaeologist though it was only his hobby as we should say today.

Enough is known about his friendship with Heinrich Schliemann, his part in the excavations at Troy and his determined support for Schliemann when he was dismissed by the experts as a fool and a dilettante.

Virchow was invited to give one of the main speeches at the First International Prehistorical Congress in Paris in 1865. In 1881 he was invited by the Russians to attend the archaeological congress in Tiflis.

His first archaeological work was in the Eastern territories where he differentiated between Slavonic and Germanic finds. He was also the first person to define the Lausitz Culture, existing some two thousand years BC.

He later began to excavate in the Caucasus. His monumental work The Graveyard of Koban in the Land of the Ossetes was published in 1883. In 1895 there appeared a large volume on "ancient bronze girdles from Trans-Caucasian graves".

Virchow was of vital importance to Schliemann as he not only supported the discovery of Troy but also did all he could to reconcile him with the country that had mocked his work.

It was Virchow who forced people to accept the view that the continuity of Western civilisation began in fact on the Western shores of Asia Minor among the Ionians.

It is surprising how rich and vivid the picture of Rudolf Virchow has recently become 150 years after his birth. Schivelbein, Pomerania, on 13 October 1821. Herbert M. Schindfeld (Hannoversche Presse, 13 October 1971)

EDUCATION

Seventy teachers from America settle down in Hamburg

Do you all understand me?" maths master William Mrozek from Illinois occasionally asks his sixth-formers in German at Hamburg's Bismarck-Gymnasium, a school boasting a good reputation in a city known to set high educational standards.

Despite possible language difficulties the boys seem to have no trouble in following their American maths master who it comes to differential calculus and algebra.

"I used to have really mediocre maths grades," sixteen-year-old Jan Schmüser comments. "At long last I now have some idea because Herr Mrozek's German is so okay that he has to take it slowly."

"German maths teachers," he adds, "used more often than not to branch out into ecstasies of mathematical eloquence that next to no one could make head or tail of."

A lightning tour of Hamburg schools enjoying some seventy teachers from the United States would seem to confirm that an experiment followed with the greatest of interest all over the country is well on the way to being a success.

Most schoolchildren are satisfied with their visiting teachers and reckon American lessons are at least as effective as the same ground covered by a teacher of German nationality.

As for the American teachers themselves they have nothing but praise for their new charges. "They are far more active and interested than their counterparts in the United States."

Last but not least Rüdiger Boye, a member of the German staff, notes that "Our American does a first-rate job. There are no difficulties in the way of discipline either." Yet form masters were a little worried to begin with that the influx of American staff might create difficulties.

Initially it looked as though Hamburg's American schoolteachers, "imported" to combat a chronic shortage of staff on the science side, were destined to become political dynamite.

Serious criticism was levelled from three quarters in early September when they first started work, the main point being that few of them spoke adequate German.

After the first week a spokesman for Hamburg's schoolchildren's "parliament" described the American teachers as a "cheap makeshift".

Communication between teacher and pupil was at times so difficult, he noted, that school-leavers might well end up with poorer Abitur grades and have trouble in gaining admission to university.

Student teachers at university voiced fears that American staff might beat them to the choice jobs, not to mention disapproval of the possibility that American teachers might be earning more money than their German counterparts.

The Christian Democratic Opposition on Hamburg city council accused the education department of launching a popular advertising campaign in the United States.

American teacher shows Hamburg pupils the ropes

(Photo: Fritz Peyer)

ed States overhastily and without consulting the Hamburg schools beforehand.

The Opposition also voiced fears that the education department had failed to emphasise the importance of visiting American teachers speaking adequate German.

William Mrozek, like most of the others, belongs to the "B" category of teachers who teach in German with an admixture of English. A few speak almost perfect German and a still smaller number speak next to none.

The education department has arranged intensive German language courses for the American staff, who are a little sceptical as to the value of them. They feel too much attention is paid to formal grammar and too little to public speaking.

The amount of teaching they do is also based on the German they speak. American teachers whose German is considered almost perfect hold twenty to 23 lessons a week, the medium category teach twelve to thirteen and the poor a maximum of six lessons a week.

The education department hopes that all American teachers will be able to do a full week's work within three months. By then they will be teaching 1,500 hours a week in maths, physics, biology and chemistry, lessons that might otherwise have fallen by the wayside because the staff to teach them is not available.

American teachers in Hamburg have two-year contracts and earn a minimum of between 1,800 and 2,800 Marks a month, the same as their German counterparts. On the other hand it has been specially agreed by the authorities in both countries that they are not eligible for taxation in this country, and they need not pay tax in the United States either.

Thomas Wolgast

(Münchener Merkur, 5 October 1971)

Frankfurter Allgemeine

ZEITUNG FÜR DEUTSCHLAND

One of the world's top ten

The Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung is the paper of the businessman, the scientist, and the politician, and indeed of everyone who matters in the Federal Republic.

For anyone wishing to penetrate the German market, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung is an essential with its authority, scope and influence.

Frankfurter Allgemeine

Foreign Advertising Department
D-4 Frankfurt/Main, Hellerhofstr. 2-4,
P.O. Box 3493, Phone 78911

What is happening in Germany? How do Germans view world events?

DIE WELT, Germany's great independent quality daily with nationwide circulation carries the answers to these questions plus full coverage of economic affairs. DIE WELT is available all over the Federal Republic and in more than 120 countries abroad. It is one of the world's very few really great newspapers. DIE WELT speaks authoritatively for West Germany all over the world. If you want to establish business connections with Germany or if you want to reach top people in the Federal Republic, then you need DIE WELT — both as reader and as advertiser.

DIE WELT is one of the world's great newspapers. Many celebrated names in German journalism are among its regular contributors. DIE WELT has staff correspondents in the major cities of the world. It is a newspaper directed at educated people, decision-makers and leading and influential figures in politics, economics and the arts. DIE WELT provides the comprehensive and reliable news coverage that helps people form their own opinion on world affairs with informed commentaries on national and world events.

DIE WELT is published daily in Berlin, Hamburg and (for the Rhine-Ruhr industrial area) in Essen. From Monday to Friday the circulation is 280,000 rising to 315,000 on Saturdays. Regular subscriptions account for 78% of net sales; the remainder are sold through normal trade channels. DIE WELT is available in over 8,000 districts of West Germany, including West Berlin. Overseas sales in 120 countries account for 22% of net sales.

DIE WELT's editorial content has won for it acclaim all over the world as an authoritative voice of West Germany. Its circulation and readership indicate the paper's influence. The only West German newspaper mentioned in a recent series of articles on sixteen leading world newspapers in The Times, London, was DIE WELT. In 1967 DIE WELT was awarded a medal of honour for outstanding journalistic achievement by the Faculty of Journalism at the University of Columbia (Mo.).

DIE WELT is ideal reading matter for people who want to be informed about West Germany and the West German view on world affairs. For people who wish to make contact with Federal Republic business and industry DIE WELT is the best advertising medium.

DIE WELT
UNABHÄNGIGE TAGESZEITUNG FÜR DEUTSCHLAND

Hamburg · Berlin · Essen · Frankfurt/M.
D 2000 Hamburg 36
Kaiser-Wilhelm-Straße 1
Tel.: (04 11) 35 11 31
Telex: 02-11 149, 02-14 272

■ THE ECONOMY

Price increases have surpassed everybody's wildest fears

Not only the fight against creeping inflation but also the latest reports from the prices battle-front have been causing great difficulties for the economic planners in Bonn of late. On both scores they have failed to come up with any original ideas for months.

In the sixth monthly report issued by the Federal Economic Affairs Ministry it was stated that it had not yet been possible to achieve "a far-reaching alteration to the unsatisfactory situation with regard to prices."

And in the eighth "...the prices situation is still unsatisfactory."

In the latest situation report the Bonn economics experts were still unable to report having achieved satisfaction. With resignation they state: "All in all the situation...has remained unsatisfactory particularly with regard to price trends. There still seem to be no signs of the upward spiral of prices abating."

The opposite is nearer the truth. Prices of consumer goods in the Federal Republic were 5.9 per cent higher this August than in the record month of August 1970. The decline in the purchasing power of the Mark continued apace, in fact at a greater rate than at any time in the past twenty years, according to the Bundesbank.

Karl Schiller, the Minister of Economic Affairs and Finance, is being held responsible for this trend by the Opposition, yet only four years ago the Professor was sure that he could control the economy and in particular prices at will.

With great self-confidence he told West German housewives in 1967: "You know that our economic policy is designed to get results over the medium term. In this context...we are striving to cut back the yearly rate of price increases from the present 1.4 or 1.5 per cent to just one per cent in 1971."

Now with 1971 three-fourths gone the index of price rises is at 5.9 per cent and the economics professor who was promoted to Finance Minister on top of his previous post as Economic Affairs Minister is a much more modest man.

He said: "We should not submit to the illusion that we can achieve price stability in the strictest sense overnight." He added that he would now be content if "...in the course of 1972 we can get back to a tolerable level of price increases."

Far from the one per cent he aimed at for this year the Professor would now be content if he could peg back the index to 3.5 per cent in 1972. And even this hope is optimistic in the extreme.

These prospects are all the more depressing for the once so triumphant Minister since he has virtually used up all his ammunition in the fight for price stability and not really hit the target.

After the Social Democrats took over government in 1969 Karl Schiller was able to carry out the revaluation of the Mark which the previous Chancellor Kurt Georg Kiesinger (CDU) had vetoed.

In an attempt to help matters by cutting government spending many of the reforms which the Social Democrats had cherished had to be sacrificed on the altar of price stability.

In order to cut down the keenness of the consumer to be parted with his money a ten per cent surcharge on income tax was imposed between August 1970 and June this year. The five thousand million Marks that this brought in were frozen in the Bundesbank vaults along with the three milliard Marks diverted from the budgets of central and Federal state governments as the economic adjustment reserve.

When all this failed to do the trick Karl Schiller spent a dramatic week fighting to free the parity of the Mark and won the day on 9 May. Thereby he introduced de facto a renewed revaluation "as the basis for a stabilisation of the domestic economic situation."

On that occasion Professor Schiller told the Bundestag: "The ninth of May is a day of stability... The way ahead towards achieving stability will still be hard. But the aim of stability is now no longer a mirage."

But now after five months of floating which has effectively revalued the Mark by more than ten per cent compared with the dollar and on average by more than seven per cent against other currencies the question whether the government is perhaps still chasing a mirage is still valid.

A look across our borders brings little comfort. Compared with international trends the Federal Republic is still in a favourable position. Even in Switzerland where stability is highly treasured the rate of inflation has reached 6.7 per cent; in the Netherlands the figure is 7.2 per cent and in Great Britain it is as high as 10.3 per cent.

Although almost one million people are out of work in Great Britain wages and prices continue to climb gaily.

President Nixon, who promised his electorate equivalent keen fighting against inflation, has had just as bitter experiences as Premier Edward Heath. Despite recession and five million unemployed in America prices there rose by six per cent in 1970.

And again at the beginning of this year with another election campaign looming large when President Nixon again launched his promises and set the course for expansion he could not escape the spectre of stagflation - combined high un-

In the next few months we will be faced with an economic development that could become perilous for the individual and for people as a whole. This is not being too alarmist.

All economic researchers and most of the politicians who deal with the economy are agreed on their forecast. All three major parties are in agreement as are both sides of industry.

Inasmuch as economic happenings can be covered by sober calculations everybody's figures for future economic trends tally.

If nothing happens to change the trend orders, investment and the level of employment will all go down in the next few months and at a greater rate than that which has been noted since the spring of this year. The overall level of productivity should stay at the stage it has now reached, but productivity in the different sectors should be affected in vastly different ways.

With the level of employment and the number of hours of overtime being worked declining the level of consumer demand is no longer likely to act as a prop for the economy.

Therefore it does not appear misplaced to compare the present situation with the 1966/67 recession. Pessimists reckon that we will not get off so lightly this time, employment and inflation. And so the unemployment figures in the United States climbed to the six-million mark.

Fearing that his goose would be cooked at the next election President Nixon saw no other choice but to implement protectionist measures and dictation of the economy - and this in a country where the freedom of the economy was always considered one of the great sacred cows.

In August he introduced a special import surcharge and a wage and price freeze to be effective until mid-November. And since then he has announced that even when these ninety days are up strict controls on wages, prices and even profits will be retained. What could not be achieved by economic means is now being tried by administrative moves.

The Scandinavian countries already put such moves into practice before America. In Britain and France too the degree of administrative interference in economic affairs is increasing.

Successes have in all cases been but slight. With their fear of difficulties on the domestic policy scene the governments are fighting halfheartedly against the symptoms and above all against the causes of price troubles.

A more basic reason for monetary inflation, however, is the inflation of demands from all sides against which economic policies are well nigh impotent. Without taking account of the overall economic situation organised vested interest groups are pushing through their members' demands for higher subsidies, more wages and shorter working hours.

With the present degree of specialisation in our economy even small groups can blackmail society by stopping essential services such as the posts, railways and air transport and can lame whole industries.

The demands of the consumer are being carried out and the consumer is not being warned off by higher and higher prices. After all he knows that another pay rise is just around the corner. At the same time everybody expects the State to produce

Bonn must speak out as economy hits danger point either, since the factors that could affect a reflation of the economy are no longer as favourable as they were five years ago.

It is more difficult to keep a tight rein on inflation since the level of price increases is so high and in the light of the world currency crisis it is unlikely that our economy will be supported on this occasion by exports.

A sober review of the economy along these lines is expected from the Bonn government in the next few weeks. It is one of their responsibilities to come clean to the citizens of this country about the economic situation.

Perhaps Willy Brandt has failed to make a statement on the economy - and he is the right man for the job - because his Economic Affairs and Finance Minister Karl Schiller has not come up with a recipe for solving the economic problems. Maybe Schiller's long absence from Bonn explains the delay.

We cannot escape unscathed after the long years of economic boom. There are no magicians in the government. In purely economic terms there are two more and more for society - schools, roads, higher subsidies, more pay for servants, more expenditure on the sciences, defence and the health service. The result is a continued strain on the economy and the symptom of the disease is inflation.

The old instruments of economic policy-making are no longer effective. While the President of the United States deals out a wage and price freeze to American dockers are out on strike.

Although Karl Schiller's additional ten per cent on the taxes froze five thousand million Marks of West German spending power the German consumer's spending spree in April this year was sixteen per cent more than at the same time last year and another nine per cent in June.

At a time when the purchase of consumer goods has prestige value in society and omnipresent advertising makes for a constantly increasing mass of consumers are not likely to be put off by a few per cent more on their taxes. Moreover no one takes promises of striving for stability seriously from a government which will soon have to stand for re-election.

While Karl Schiller is fighting desperately for price stability and his reputation as an economic master, the Chancellor can not refrain from saying that the effort are not so serious. Before the delegates of IG Metall and in the Bremen local election campaign Willy Brandt reassurances that "stabilisation of the economy must not take place over the dead bodies of the workers."

Naturally the Opposition is not being surprised in inconsistency by anyone and certainly not by the government. Although their spokesmen constantly make loud lamentations whenever talk turns to prices no day passes without their moaning about the consequences of efforts to restore stability.

Nor has the CDU/CSU come up with a recipe of how to restore stability and full employment under the present circumstances.

Meanwhile Willy Brandt has distanced himself from "unrealistic suggestions about the degree of price stability that can be achieved in the short-term." And his Economic Affairs Minister Karl Schiller would be content if he could achieve in the long-term no more than what he rejected in early 1970 when he stated optimistically: "Price increases of two or 2.5 per cent in the middle-term are too high for us."

Michael Jungblut
(Die Zeit, 15 October 1971)

possible courses in a phase where recession is on the way in. A booster can be given by means of government contracts, particularly in the building industry, lower interest rates and a repayment of taxes or lowering of the present tax rates.

Such measures could mean that production capacities here would be used in the full again. But price rises would continue.

The other possibility is to wait for price stability as a solid basis for growth and prosperity. This method is favoured by those who point out that price rises sabotage all efforts to distribute wealth more fairly.

Since the Bundesbank decided to make credit easier to come by we have come to realise that economic policymakers are not stability fanatics. They do pay attention to industry and the needs of those who earn their bread from it. But Bonn does not intend the Bundesbank's attitude to be taken as a booster. There is an aversion in Bonn to a shot-in-the-arm of this kind, partly because the level of prices for consumer goods is about six per cent up on the figures for the same period of last year.

Here and there people are showing less and less effort and the desire to get things done is beginning to flag. But out

Continued on page 11

WORKING CONDITIONS

Munich professor recommends 6-hour day instead of 4-day week

1,000 workers subjected to an investigation in Baden-Württemberg were found to be ill. More than eighty per cent of white-collar workers, according to a recent Confederation of Federal Republic Trade Unions' report do not sit properly in their office and as a result suffer from bad posture leading to spinal damage and slipped discs as well as nerve damage.

There has been a startling increase in disability at an early age in the Federal Republic. Alarming stories of this kind can be heard and read almost every day. Recently the Bavarian Academy for Medicine at Work and in Society held a conference in Munich dealing with the topic "Nervous and Psychic Strain at Work."

The Süddeutsche Zeitung recently spoke with the head of the Institute for Physiology and Working Conditions at Munich's Technische Universität, Professor Wolf Müller-Limmroth. He was asked what are the main dangers at work and how they could be counteracted.

The Professor's working day obviously involves such a tight schedule that he has to divide his time up into minutes. On his desk he has three different hour glasses going at the same time. It is not necessary to use an alarm clock: when the sand has run through your time is up. Behind him there sits a worried secretary who chimes in: "It's eleven o'clock." Time for the Professor's next interview.

Despite the constant demands made on him Professor Müller-Limmroth is of amazing vitality and shows no signs of being even after spending three quarters of an hour expressing his thoughts without a break.

From time to time he draws contentedly on his cigar and swivels in his office chair, which he describes as "optimally comfortable". Apart from being completely adjustable to fit the body and slow movement the chair is covered with sheepskin which the Professor explains is cool in summer and warm in winter.

Men at work is now subject to completely different demands, the Professor explains. In the past the main demand on him was for hard physical graft but now with mechanisation, automation and rationalisation it is his nerves and mind that bear the brunt.

Even in factories any number of people employed in a controlling function, adjusting clocks and dials and operating levers. These workers must keep their concentration at all times during the shift so that they can leap into action at any time. They can never relax.

The daily graph of a man is as follows: with a low-average output. He reaches his energy peak at eleven. After lunch signs of fatigue creep up on him no matter economic system cannot function without individuals being given incentives to greater productivity.

Continued from page 10

It is one of the most pressing tasks of the government in Bonn to extricate the country from this situation as quickly as possible.

It is essential that the government break down this wall of silence with regard to the present state of the economy or there is a danger that it will fall between two stools.

And words alone are not sufficient. Kurt Simon time or not. His lowest point is reached about two in the afternoon.
(Frankfurter Rundschau, 15 October 1971)

He is able to reach another peak of activity towards four o'clock but this is not so productive or energetic as the eleven o'clock spurt. From then on there is an irrevocable downward trend. The absolute low of human activity is in the wee small hours about two a.m. This is critical for those on the nightshift.

Therefore if a constant level of productivity is to be expected from an eight hour shift those concerned must have an opportunity to stoke up their reserves.

If a man is forced to completely exhaust himself day in and day out he becomes nervous and irritable and in the end falls sick. "Apart from holiday times this stress is often imposed throughout a whole life-time," the Professor said.

He added: "Demands on the nerves are in the long run far more hazardous than bodily exhaustion."

The greatest difficulty on the factory floor or in offices today consists of reconciling this biological graph to the productive powers of the work force. It must be taken into account that the ability to concentrate is subject to ups and downs. For a brainworker as opposed to manual labourer twenty minutes is the maximum period for which he can be expected to concentrate fully and remain equally attentive and on the quiver. Another factor is that the degree of attentiveness is practically dependent on conditions at the place of work.

Experts say that today about half of the so-called open-plan offices are not up to scratch. They lack the amenities that make such rooms tolerable such as full airconditioning, sound-proofing, carpeting, well designed furniture, good lighting, and interview rooms.

Professor Müller-Limmroth said: "I am not basically against open-plan offices but they should be broken up in some way, for example with shelves for books or flowers. This would help to cut down the disruptive noise level caused by interviews, telephones and the din of modern office machinery."

The sheer monotony of sounds from adding machines or comptometers can lower the level of concentration. At the same time the soporific effect of these noises can cause metabolic disorders, such as a nervous stomach, heart ailments and circulatory dysfunctions. The result of this can be irritability and even apathy. Soft music is one way of overcoming this.

An important part of productivity at work is quite literally the climate at the place of work: heating, lighting and airconditioning. Professor Müller-Limmroth's institute has stated that the air temperature should be between 70 and 74 degrees Fahrenheit, the rate of movement of the air from airconditioning should not be more than 0.2 metres per second and the relative humidity should be between forty and sixty per cent. For the absolute maximum of concentration the upper limit of "wind speed" in a room should be half the above mentioned figure.

Another factor to be taken into account is difference in the sexes. As women have a thicker layer of fat under their skin their skin temperature drops quicker which explains why at places of work where men and women are together the women tend to complain of feeling cold while the men are too warm.

Professor Müller-Limmroth said: "From the managerial point of view it is never wrong to invest in anything that makes for greater efficiency at the place of work."

In the draughtsman's office the controlled bodily movements required become more accurate. Typists make fewer errors. There is less inefficiency on the conveyor belts.

Food too should be geared to professional requirements. It should not contain too much fat and should be rich in high quality animal albumen. A most important requirement is sufficient vitamin B-1, which can be obtained from dark breads and Swedish bread, oats, lean pork, milk and curds.

Now we have pinpointed the mortal sins at a place of work: a bad climate, noise and monotony, poor furnishings and fittings leading to bad posture, bad eating habits and a lack of refreshment pauses. In addition the Professor adds: "Bad sleeping habits, an incorrect rhythm of work and refreshment and bad holiday habits."

This, Professor Müller-Limmroth explains quite rightly, is a bone of contention.

He said: "In future when there is talk of shortening the work period I would be all in favour of cutting the amount of work done per day and making the cuts in the second half of the shift where a working man uses up more of his reserves and is then subjected to the mad rush to get home through the evening traffic chaos. Instead of giving workers a longer week-end which they would only tend to use in haring around with their car it would be far better from the point of view of work and health to strive for the six-hour day rather than the four-day week."

The main reason for the Professor's ideas, he explains thus: "We know the effect long layoffs cause to work and productivity and from the medical point of view the third day of a holiday is crisis day. If a man goes back to work after a three-day layoff his productivity subsides noticeably. One symptom of this is how uncertain many drivers are on a Monday morning."

Unfortunately stress at work today is having a disturbing effect on sleep. People today go to bed much later than their parents and grandparents' generation in the days before electric light or television. After the intensive strain of work they have difficulty falling asleep. Normally a healthy man falls immediately into a deep sleep and then gradually returns to consciousness towards morning. More and more people today do not follow this graph in their sleep. Many wake up between three and four o'clock have difficulty falling asleep again and then cannot drag themselves out of bed in the morning.

Therefore, in the Professor's opinion, it is most important for people to have two holidays a year. He is not in favour of holidays shorter than three weeks in length and favours two four-week holidays every year.

Moreover the ability to find relaxation and refreshment varies with the seasons and according to professions. For those who require physical fitness holidays in July and August with a good dose of ultraviolet sunlight are the best type.

For those who suffer from metabolic malfunctions such as nervous stomach, heart complaints and insomnia, mainly mental workers, the best time to take a holiday is January and February. Insomniacs should take winter holidays.

These holiday schedules for mental or physical workers are in no way dependent on where they take their holidays. If they feel like flying to Bangkok there is no objection. The most important point is to get out of the treadmill, eat regularly and slowly, go to bed at the right time and take plenty of walks in the fresh air.

In conclusion Professor Wolf Müller-Limmroth said: "Human energy is far too expensive and far too precious to be squandered."

Ingeborg Münzing

(Frankfurter Rundschau, 9 October 1971)

DAG social welfare plans vaguely worded

Delegates' comments ranged from "Marxistic" and "most grave" to "as binding as a Neckermann mail-order catalogue". These wide-ranging appraisals referred to the new programme of social welfare that had just been approved by DAG, the West German White-Collar Workers' Union, at its national congress in Nuremberg.

The result of this heavy toil was a compromise corresponding to the wide range of party-political views represented by this organisation.

Controversial points were at times so vaguely formulated that they could in many cases be interpreted in a variety of different ways. In other sections of the programme it was easy to see through the attempt to veil wishywashy statements with tough words.

In places where no unity at all was possible the congress report skated round the point.

The delegates' debate reached fever pitch above all at the question of land laws. The committee had not satisfied itself with a non-binding desire to see reform in this sphere, but had also submitted detailed suggestions for countering land speculation.

According to this land and building sites should be made over to the State as so-called higher property. For their erstwhile owners there would remain legal rights of usage as "sub property owners". But the land would no longer be theirs to speculate with.

This suggestion was like a red rag to the property ideologists. They spoke in terms of socialisation and confiscation. Confirmed Christian Democrats at this threatened that they have to consider seriously their membership of the DAG if their objections fell on deaf ears.

But the love of house and garden prevailed and the majority of the delegates with their more conservative outlook refused to give their approval to the committee's concept. So the final version appearing in the DAG programme was that "something must be done about it!"

The whole catalogue of ideas contained little of any originality. The demands for worker participation on an equal basis, profit sharing and the introduction of a flexible retiring age - to name but a few - have been raised time and again by unions.

But despite many surface flaws this programme gives the DAG a platform from which to launch its social welfare plans.

Chairman Hermann Brandt summed up: "The discussion will never cease. We don't want stagnation, we want progress."

Peter Pragal

(Süddeutsche Zeitung, 15 October 1971)

هكذا من العسل

Today, when you buy a Pan Am ticket, you get even more for your money. Because we do things that make your travel more profitable and more enjoyable. Things that invite comparison shopping with any other airline in the world.

Our 747s have exclusive compartmented containers for everything you don't carry aboard. On the ground or in the air it all rides upright and secure. Helps protect against spilling and denting.

If you're in business and you need help in overseas expansion, you've come to the right place. Our exclusive Worldwide Marketing Service has listings of buyers and sellers of all kinds of things in all kinds of places.

A black and white photograph showing a hand holding a Pan American Airlines ticket stub. The ticket is dark with a white band across the middle that reads "PAN AMERICAN" in bold, capital letters. Above this band, in smaller text, it says "ECONOMY CLASS". Below the band, there is a section for "FARE BASIS" and "FARE", followed by a section for "CARRIER" and "CLASS". The ticket is being held by a hand, with the thumb visible on the left side. The background is white.

When you fly Pan Am you don't have to let money stand in your way, because we're ready and willing to finance your trip for you. You can pay us back in easy monthly instalments. Call your Pan Am Travel Agent for details.

Forty years in the air have made us the world's most experienced airline. The airline that has done — and will keep doing — more for its passengers.

When you fly Pan Am to the U.S.A., you've got Theatre-in-the-Air® flying with you. It gives you a choice of two feature films*, Broadway show music, classical music and rock music. All under one roof.

What's more, both music and movie will come to you on our new earphones. They're also specially designed—to be comfortable, light weight and easy on your ears.

Travel Books Galore.
Long established as authoritative sources of information on the worldwide travel scene.

No other airline comes close to providing you with such a wealth of titles. Among them: New Horizons® World Guide, Pleasures of the Spa, Passports & Profits, and many more. Available at nominal cost at any Pan Am Travel Agent or Pan Am Ticket Office.

Something new from the world's most experienced airline

the 1980s, the 1990s, and the 2000s. The 1980s were characterized by a focus on the environment, the 1990s by a focus on the economy, and the 2000s by a focus on the war in Iraq. The 1980s were also characterized by a focus on the environment, the 1990s by a focus on the economy, and the 2000s by a focus on the war in Iraq.

NARCOTICS

Police advise parents how to counter drug menace

Recently Federal Republic police organized a special drug fighting week in which they concentrated on the main areas of attention in their anti-drug campaign. The main centre of attention was to enlighten the general public about the unscrupulous exploitation by dealers and smugglers as well as combating criminal acts carried out in an attempt to procure drugs, and as a consequence of taking them. Such criminal acts are causing increasing worry.

Felonies in connection with drugtaking or dealing increased last year by more than 238 per cent over the previous year. Another massive increase is expected for 1971.

In a statement in connection with this police campaign by Richard Lehner, Lower Saxony Minister of the Interior, he said: "The drugtaker is more and more often under the influence of other criminal elements since he rarely has sufficient money to procure the drugs he needs. Therefore the actual crime of messing with drugs is directly linked with crimes committed before and after taking them."

With posters and leaflets the police are trying to bring home to young people that their efforts are directed against the seducers and not the seduced. They have devised slogans such as "Drugs: You end up on the scrapheap and the pusher cries all the way to the bank."

Parents and teachers are aimed at in brochures with slogans such as "Ruin the hashish business!" The police are in this way trying to drum up reinforcements against drug abuse and crime.

Drastic examples from police files throw light on the realities of the dope scene and warn "next time it could be a friend of yours!"

In Lower Saxony alone the figures for drugtaking are warning enough. In the seven months up till the end of August this year drugtaking was on the increase. In 1966 Lower Saxony had only 122 cases of crime in connection with narcotics. In 1966 this figure had doubled and in 1970 it leapt up to 1,198. In the first seven months of 1971 alone 1,502 cases were reported.

The number of minors involved has shot up even faster. In 1966 there were six, by 1969 this had risen to 127, in 1970 it was 345 and by the end of August 1971 a further 277.

In 1966 there were two chemist shop break-ins with the aim of stealing drugs. There was little change in this figure by 1969 but in 1970 there was a major increase to 78 thefts and in the first seven months of this year there were 203.

"What can we do about it?" the police statement asks on behalf of the general public. The answers they give:

* Take an interest in your children's

Increased drugtaking in prisons

In order to achieve intoxication the patients smoke tranquilizers, inhale hair-sprays, get a fix with smuggled dope by injecting themselves with a ballpen and swallow spoonful after spoonful of powdered coffee straight from the jar.

In order to forget their drab everyday existence they sacrifice their health and stake their lives. It is not only in the outside world but also behind prison bars that doctors and welfare workers have unexpectedly come up against the drug epidemic.

It is easier to confiscate drugs from convicts than anyone else. But they do not let it stop there.

"We will have to come up with something," stressed Eckard Reith from Mannheim at a congress of about fifty prison doctors from the Federal Republic, Switzerland and Austria recently in Munich.

On the question of drug dependency the discussion showed that there was large-scale perplexity.

Dr Georg Zylka, senior physician to Munich prisons, stressed that "we in Munich are no longer able to bother about small scale drug-taking" and he problems and those of other young people.

* Never forget the important sense of family loyalty and security and provide a sound basis for mutual trust.

* Don't put talking about drugs on your list of taboos. Discuss narcotics at length with your children in a matter-of-fact way. Never encourage the secrecy that often surrounds drugtaking in the young.

* Experience of late shows that apart from the curiosity factor drugs are often seen as the last resort for mental torment. Do not let your children get into such a state.

* Help solve your children's problems in the presence of other people from their groups of friends who are recognised by the youngsters, accepted by them and with whom they have daily contact.

* If you feel you are not competent to handle the situation because your family problems are worse than you ever suspected do not hesitate to seek the advice of experts.

All health offices in this country are available for consultations.

(Hannoversche Allgemeine, 4 October 1971)

recounted incidents "which made us run hot and cold".

He was shocked at the increase in the number of suicides in prison.

Hans Herrmannsdorfer from the juvenile prison in Erbach said that the majority of his patients with a drug-taking record realised that they were running the risk of killing themselves. They preferred a "short, beautiful world of dreams" to a "long, dreary existence".

The prison doctors meeting in Munich were not able to produce statistics. Since familiarity with drugs has virtually become part of the special image of a juvenile delinquent the young offender when put behind bars has to make it his boast that he has taken all kinds of drugs.

His boasts are not always true and therefore any statistics drawn up may err on the disquieting side, and figures are also distorted by the fact that prison officers do not know the different kinds of drugs.

One prison doctor complained that an old lag who has been caught in possession of drugs by a prison officer can easily pass off the contraband as normal tobacco.

(Frankfurter Rundschau, 2 October 1971)

A policeman's lot is still not a happy one

Federal Republic alone only about one half could be solved.

The insufficient degree of success in clearing up these crimes prompted Herr Bauer to make the following claims: powers of arrest and bans on the possession of weapons must be tightened up; security measures to prevent the theft of identity papers from town halls should be stepped up, and the laws governing registration of guests in hotels should once again be more strictly enforced.

When bank robbers are caught they should be deprived of their driving licence and any vehicle in their possession.

Günter Bauer told the police that they should spend less time following the movements of old bank robbers who had retired from their profession and concentrate far more on keeping tabs on up-and-coming young hoodlums.

Chance was often on the side of law, he said, but warned against placing too much reliance on it.

The fight against the narcotics syndicates has still not been won, but the German member of Interpol in Paris, Dr Rebscher, prophesied that governments, the police and customs officials would succeed gradually in stopping the supplies of drugs getting through.

Senior police official Hjalmar Friberg from Stockholm said that he had not as yet had any explanation given him of why the major drug smugglers of the Federal Republic, the United States and Oriental countries concentrated to such an extent on the relatively small area of Sweden.

He said that hundreds of thousands of capsules containing these poisonous substances had been dropped by air over Sweden and opium and heroin were even being sold in liquid form in cola and lemonade drinks. The police in Sweden had even confiscated toothpicks impregnated with LSD.

Hjalmar Friberg gave details of hashish confiscations in 1970 at important drug smuggling centres as follows: Frankfurt 1,300 kilograms, Hamburg 1,000 kg, Paris 654 kg, London 490 kg, Copenhagen 500 kg and Stockholm 90 kg.

Hans Willenweber
(Frankfurter Rundschau, 27 September 1971)

NEWS IN BRIEF

Juvenile crime

Willi Weyer (FDP), Interior Minister in the North-Rhine-Westphalia state government, has expressed concern at the increase in juvenile crime.

In an interview on Deutschlandsradio, radio station, he said that every other person involved in serious theft, damage to private property or robbery was under the age of 21 and male.

(Frankfurter Rundschau, 27 September 1971)

No rings

Every other married man in this country, 48 per cent in fact, and one of every eight women, 12 per cent, do not wear a wedding ring, according to a survey conducted by the Wicket Institute.

The Institute asked married people, "Do you wear a wedding or engagement ring and if so on which finger?"

Ten years ago 38 per cent of the men asked and nine per cent of the women said that they did not wear a wedding ring.

According to a survey conducted in 1971 thirty nine per cent of the men and 79 per cent of the women wore their wedding ring on the right hand, and 14 per cent of men and nine per cent of women wore the ring on the left hand.

The survey further revealed that 51 per cent of those asked wore an engagement ring. Forty nine per cent claimed that they did not.

(Neue Ruhr Zeitung, 30 September 1971)

Sauna gains fans

Sauna baths are gaining popularity in the Federal Republic, according to the Federal Sauna Association in Bad Godesberg.

The Association stated that the 3,000 public saunas in this country attracted 3 million people last year. The main reasons these people gave for seeking it out, according to an Association survey, were relaxation and refreshment, toughening up, fitness and - particularly in the case of women who made up 41 per cent of sauna bathers - "good looks".

Sauna fans are mainly between the age of 21 and 50 with young people up to the age of thirty forming about a third. According to the Association the best advert for the Finnish style of bath came from personal recommendations. Only two per cent of those questioned said they had first tried it on the advice of friends.

(Kölnischer Stadt-Anzeiger, 8 October 1971)

Bonn females

With a certain amount of regret Bonn's city council has announced: "The Federal Republic capital's claim that it can be guaranteed that men will have a wide choice of girls in the capital because of the excess of females, must be taken with a pinch of salt."

In a recent census it was revealed that for every 100 men in the capital - population 300,000 - there were only 110 females.

The reason for this is that there has been an amalgamation of Bad Godesberg, Beuel and eight other neighbouring municipalities with Bonn.

Prior to this the chances for Bonn females was twice as low since for every 120 women there were 100 men.

(Frankfurter Rundschau, 12 October 1971)

SPORT

The modern athlete trains to be a dehumanised super-human

Man and coaches frequently differ in the critical observer in their assessment of competitive sport and all that it entails nowadays. High-jump champion Thomas Zacharias, for instance, wrote in the toughest of training articles by Horst Vetter on "Sport Records" outlines ideas that are not in their entirety by the sports and of Süddeutsche Zeitung.

Very morning a young man in Bellenberg, Swabia, started his day by trying to breakfast his way through a quarter of the six thousand calories he had to consume daily.

He is so sick and tired of the sight of animal protein as contained in steak, soft cheese, eggs and milk, that he polishes off his amount in concentrated form.

He then settled down to his day's work, which largely consists of lifting weights amounting to many times his own two and a half hundredweight.

As his dismaying his calorie intake and output have remained roughly equal during the warm summer months with the result that he has put on no extra weight. Yet if experience is anything to go by he will put on weight.

Unless he puts on another 33 pounds over the next year his prospects at the Munich Olympics will decline considerably.

Weight-lifter Rudolf Mang from Bellenberg is but one of any number of athletes who got up this morning determined to work out even harder today than they did yesterday.

The only needs to treble the number of athletes, roughly fifteen thousand, who will be taking part in next year's Olympic Games to visualise the equivalent of the population of a medium-sized town all over the world driving themselves to the limit of physical endurance.

Competitive or top-flight sport is the seemingly harmless name given to an occupation that has long since ceased to be a mere game and is now nothing more and less than deadly earnest.

Modern sport, which used to be the privilege of gentlemen and amateurs, is no longer a laughing matter. To use the words of Spanish philosopher Ortega y Gasset its exponents are brothers of the masses, indeed brothers of the hardest of manual labourers.

Successful athletes are the object of public interest in both senses of the word. They are coached, trained, shunted around and what began as a hobby becomes a burden lightened only by a sense of duty.

Young men or women athletes can read and learn themselves in the newspapers and discover what exemplary creatures they are.

In headlines and public discourses their achievement effort is made out to be much the same way as active service in the armed forces used to be held as the highest of virtues.

The State, regardless of the ideology to which it professes, decorates its athlete-heroes with awards and medals, society considers them to be its pride and joy and worldwide obeisance to brawn differs in degree only from one country to the next.

Regardless whether the winner of the Olympic gold medal at Munich in the high-jump is an American or a Russian there will be some people among the audience who view the achievement purely in terms of increasingly defying the power of gravity.

By and large, though, the high-jump gold medal will merely be viewed as part and parcel of the sum total of victories and defeats. For propaganda purposes it will be part of a variation on the theme of competition between countries and class struggle.

Once he is involved in the machinery of competitive sport the athlete is virtually unable to extricate himself from the ins and outs of his chosen field of interest.

He is dependent on society because he allows himself to be either assisted or maintained by society and he is in far less of a position than almost anyone else in a society geared to accomplishment to pull out of the rat race.

Preranged norms subjected to critical scrutiny by the entire country determine his daily round. He eats, drinks and sleeps according to plan, even regulating his sex life according to schedule.

In what are often months of restraint he subordinates his wishes to a scale of values and concentrates his creative energy and instinct on a few brief moments of all-out effort on the day.

Top-flight athletes are models of self-restraint but the element of self is somewhat restricted. His every need is catered for by a retinue of coaches and aides.

These aides keep a tight rein on their charge's athletic machinery. They measure his heartbeat and blood pressure, check his pace and angle of throw, ensure that his right biceps are half as large again as his left, boost impetus or stamina and fatten a weight-lifter or slim a boxer as required.

In a word, they manipulate his body in such a way as to ensure peak performance. There he is, a miracle of muscle and ligament. And although the top-flight athlete also has a soul of his own that is something he is left to cope with himself.

When Vera Nikolic of Yugoslavia, the European 800 metres champion, proved a failure at the 1968 Mexico Olympics she tried to commit suicide.

Ricky Bruch, Sweden's white hope in the discus, was upset by a horoscope on the flight to Helsinki and the European athletics championships. His reaction was virtually to demolish the aeroplane cabin in mid-air.

Before the starter's gun sounds Heide Rosendahl of this country performs a number of exercises designed to aid concentration and bringing to mind the prayer rites of Tibetan monks.

Athletes may not be relieved of the psychic burden but the physical side has been perfected to a degree. Specialists at various faculties have contributed towards a tuning of athletes' bodies as a result of which the tail end of an Olympic 10,000 metres today is still a good ten seconds faster than the 1936 record-holder.

Merely to qualify for participation the 1936 Olympic hammer-throwing gold medalist would have to throw the hammer 33 feet further than he did to win Olympic gold thirty-five years ago.

It will not be long before women clear seven metres (23 feet) in the long-jump. Yet at Berlin in 1936 a jump of this distance would have been sufficient to win a man Olympic gold.

Incredible though improvements on this scale may seem the sporting public is never satisfied. For them the incredible is a matter of course. The fans do not hope, they do not expect; they demand that records fall, or at least that their man or woman wins.

At the Tokyo Olympics Ingrid Becker of this country was only two centimetres short of an Olympic bronze medal in the long-jump. She spent the rest of the day running the gauntlet of commiseration. That evening a press conference was held at which she put in an appearance.

Ingrid was the world's fourth-best - unfortunately. It might have been a funeral gathering until someone naively went up to her and congratulated her on her performance, saying that fourth-best was something to write home about.

Otherwise self-controlled, Ingrid Becker

1972 Olympics filmmakers lined up

The film of the 1972 Munich Olympics has now been arranged, the Olympic organising committee having awarded the contract to Bavaria Studios of Munich and Wolpert Pictures of Los Angeles. The two companies will foot the bill and no further financing will be needed.

The contract includes a right to a say in the artistic direction of the film for the organising committee, a point on which a number of previous negotiations have come to grief.

The film is to include a number of sequences directed by a variety of foreign directors including, it is hoped, Fred Zinnemann, Billy Wilder, Roman Polanski, Akira Kurosawa, Richard Lester, John Schlesinger, Federico Fellini, Ingmar Bergman, Franco Zeffirelli, Michelangelo Antonioni, Vittorio de Sica and Luis Buñuel.

The producers are thinking in terms of a German director coordinating film work, possibly Michael Pfleghar.

(Die Welt, 12 October 1971)

burst into tears. It was, she said, the first time that day anyone had congratulated her.

Top-flight athletes are geared to win and this compulsion affects their personalities accordingly, so much so that they can no longer distinguish between natural reactions and what they have drilled into them.

They no longer train, they put their whole lives into their work but fail to realise the fact or if they do so take good care to forget it. The net result of their efforts is assessed by millions of people in terms of the times and distances that flash on the scoreboard.

Months and years of hard work are reduced to tenths of a second and fractions of a centimetre. Horst Vetter
(Süddeutsche Zeitung, 9 October 1971)

Sports league membership nears 11 million

Next year, Olympic year, the Federal Republic Sports League, an organisation to which virtually all sports associations and clubs in the country are affiliated, will almost certainly boast eleven million members.

Over the last twelve months 672,472 new members have joined the DSB, to use its German initials, bringing total membership to 10,794,018.

The DSB is not only by far the largest organisation in the Federal Republic inclusive of West Berlin but has yet again increased its lead over other organisations.

Between July 1970 and the end of this June membership increased all over the country, the record being in Schleswig-Holstein where campaigning resulted in an 8.9-per-cent increase.

The largest affiliated association is the Federal Republic Football League, which now boasts a membership of 2.93 million. As in the past the gymnasts are runners-up with an organised membership of 2.36 million.

In order of numerical strength the next on the list are the marksmen, with 723,724 members, the athletes, with 635,601 members, the swimmers, with 467,040 members, and the handball players, with 417,762 members.

The number of yachtsmen affiliated to the yachting association has declined by 14.5 per cent. Other sports associations with declining membership figures are the golfers (8.4 per cent), water-skiers (6.2 per cent), exponents of the modern pentathlon (4.9 per cent), ice-skaters (3.5 per cent), chess-players (2.3 per cent), amateur boxers (1.5 per cent) and cyclists (0.5 per cent). In several instances the decline is something of a danger signal.

Despite many mergers the number of sports clubs increased by 626 during the period under review, though definitely fewer new clubs are being founded. The total number of sports clubs in the Federal Republic and West Berlin is 39,827.

DSB president Dr. Wilhelm Kregel of Celle described the membership increase as an impressive contribution by our affiliate association to the pre-Olympic year.

(Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung für Deutschland, 14 October 1971)

SA $ 0.85	Colombia col. $ 1-	Formosa NT 2.5-	Indonesia Rp. 12-	Malewi M. $ 0.40	Paraguay Gu. 12-	Sudan S. 2.50	PT 2.5-
AF 10-	Congo (Brazzaville) C.F.A. 30-	France FF 0.80	Iran R. 10-	Malaysia M. $ 0.40	Peru P. 10-	Syria S. 2.50	SA 2.50
DA 0.50	Congo (Kinshasa) C.F.A. 30-	Gabon G. 10-	Iraq I. 10-	Mexico M. $ 1.50	Philippines P. 10-	Tanzania T. 2.50	TA 2.50
Esc. 1-	Costa Rica C. 0.85	Camble C. 10-	Israel I. 10-	Morocco M. $ 0.40	Portugal P. 10-	Thailand T. 2.50	T. 2.50
m a 45-	Cuba C. 10-	Chad C. 10-	Italy I. 10-	Mozambique M. $ 0.40	Rhodesia R. 10-	Trinidad and Tobago T. 2.50	T. 2.50
	Cyprus C. 10-	China C. 10-	Jamaica J. 10-	Nepal N. 10-	Romania R. 10-	Togo T. 2.50	T. 2.50
	Czechoslovakia C. 10-	Colombia C. 10-	Japan J. 10-	Netherlands Antilles N. 10-	Saudi Arabia S. 10-	Tunisia T. 2.50	T. 2.50
	Dahomey D. 10-	Congo (Kinshasa) C.F.A. 30-	Jordan J. 10-	Nicaragua N. 10-	Swaziland S. 10-	Uganda U. 10-	U. 10-
	Dem. Rep. D. 10-	Cuba C. 10-	Kenya K. 10-	Niger N. 10-	Switzerland S. 10-	USA U. 10-	U. 10-
	Ecuador E. 10-	Cyprus C. 10-	Kuwait K. 10-	Nigeria N. 10-	Sweden S. 10-	USSR U. 10-	U. 10-
	El Salvador S. 10-	Czechoslovakia C. 10-	Laos L. 10-	Pakistan P. 10-	Switzerland S. 10-	Venezuela V. 10-	V. 10-
	Ethiopia E. 10-	Dahomey D. 10-	Lebanon L. 10-	Panama P. 10-	Switzerland S. 10-	Yugoslavia Y. 10-	Y. 10-
	Finland F. 10-	Dem. Rep. D. 10-	Libya L. 10-		Switzerland S. 10-	Zambia Z. 10-	Z. 10-
		Ecuador E. 10-	Luxembourg L. 10-		Switzerland S. 10-
		El Salvador S. 10-	Madagascar M. 10-		Switzerland S. 10-
		Ethiopia E. 10-			Switzerland S. 10-
		Finland F. 10-			Switzerland S. 10-
					Switzerland S. 10-		